SCHEMMELFENNIG.

BRAVE Teuton, though thy awful name
Is one no common rhyme can mimic,
Though in despair the trump of Fame
Evades thy painful patronymic—
Though orators forego thy praise,
And timid bards by tongue or pen ignore thee—thus alone I raise
Thy name in song, my Schemmelfennig!

What though no hecatombs may swell
With mangled forms thy path victorious;
Though Charleston to thee bloodless fell,
Wert thou less valiant or less glorious?
Thou took'st tobacco—cotton—grain
And slaves—they say a hundred and ten niggers were captives in thy train
And swelled thy pomp, my Schemmelfennig!

Let Ashoth mourn his name unsung,
And Schurz his still unwritten story;
Let Blenker grieve the silent tongue,
And Zagouyi forego his glory;
Ye are but paltry farthing lamps,
Your lights the fickle marsh or fen ignus fatuus of Southern swamps,
Beside the sun of Schemmelfennig!

SAN FRANCISCO, April 1st, 1865.

AN OPEN LETTER.

SAN FRANCISCO, March 26, 1865.

HAVING been to church this morning, and listened to the sermon as attentively as became a confirmed churchwoman, I feel that I can conscientiously employ a portion of this Sabbath evening in writing a letter to that eminently religious and moral journal, THE CALIFORNIAN.

By the by, speaking of churches, reminds me of that extremely nice, interesting young gentleman that had a seat in our pew to-day. I wonder who he could be? He was evidently new to our style of worship, for when I handed him the open prayer-book he looked at it a moment with an inquiring glance; and then opened his mouth—to sing, as I at first thought, but no—to thank me and lay the book upon the cushion. Had he reposed there himself, "it would have been better for me," but he persisted in getting up and sitting down at the wrong times, and then trying to look as though he hadn't committed a grave and serious error. However, these little faux pas were more than compensated for by his benign smile, and distinguished moustache; and I had to repeat with great fervor, "From all the deceits of the world, the flesh and the Devil, good Lord deliver us," before I could pay devout attention to the doctrinal principles our beloved pastor was endeavoring to inculcate. And then, on leaving, Wild read me a lecture as long as the list of major-generals on the impropriety of letting one's attention wander from the sermon. Wasn't that disheartening after trying as hard as I had tried to be good?

However, that's the way of the world. Goodness is never properly appreciated, and I in common with other great people am a great and living example of unacknowledged virtue.

Meeting that versatile and graceful (if I were talking to him I should say graceless) INIGO the other day, he insisted that I should contribute something for the next CALIFORNIAN—a letter, a criticism, or anything—and being in an amiable mood I promised, at that time intending to pay a visit to the Art Union, and give a description of a few of the pictures, with thoughts as they suggested themselves to me; but Mark Twain forestalled that idea, and after reading his characteristically intelligent, graphic and concise account of his visit, I had nothing to say. Surely I think Mark was inspired when he wrote that letter—inspired with brandy and water I would say, but I am not sure about the water.

Do you know, I think all our writers have been "inspired" lately, judging from the number of new books that I see noticed in the last Atlantic. I should be very sorry to have to read them all, but I have a curiosity to see that new book by Mrs. Brigadier-General Egbert Viele. In taking her husband's title, hasn't that lady struck something new? I think I shall try and have Wild made a Major-General—he would belong to the majority then. You know he has been very successful lately in the mines of Mexico, and has a brother who is a Government contractor at Washington; so with his influence and a judicious present of a few "feet," he could easily get the "wish of his heart," and then I would write for THE CALIFORNIAN over the signature of Mrs. Major-General Wild. Isn't that a sounding of brass? Vive la Shoddy! But now-a-days paste passes current for real diamonds in more "things" than one. As Meg Merrill has it, "Genius starves to feast Buffoonery." By the way, I have the greatest curiosity to know who Meg Merrill is; I tried to induce INIGO to divulge the other day, but he only looked very knowing, and replied she was a Mrs. Smith, but whether or not it is Sarah, wife of John, I was unable to ascertain. At any rate she is a piquant writer, quick and graceful. I was truly sorry to miss her sketches in the last two CALIFORNIANS, and only hope she will not continue to hide her light under a bushel. It occurs to me that perhaps her liege lord found an ink-stain on one of her fairy fingers and called her to account, giving her at the same time a lecture on the proper sphere of woman, apropos of custards and pies, and the growing necessity of keeping the ladies down, a la Paul Emanuel. Now, mon cher Editeur, if by any mischance or for lack of anything else this letter is honored with a place in your columns, I hope you will never mention it to my husband. You know he has the temper of an angel, still he entertains orthodox principles as regards the superiority of his sex, and holds in profound contempt a woman who writes poetry or dabbles in politics.

It was only the other day he returned home unexpectedly, and found me deep in Gail Hamilton's New Atmosphere. A change in the atmosphere was very apparent at once. He snatched the book out of my hands with a look on his face that the fanatic's might have worn when he seized the heretic's Bible and consigned it to what he considered the most fitting place for it, the fire, and then turned upon me, saying he had suspected me of writing an article or so in one of the papers, and now he was convinced of it; for any one who would read her book, would write for a paper. I hardly wonder that gentlemen generally dislike Gail Hamilton. She seems to me a very intelligent person, that disdains crinoline—one who would be admired for her brain, not loved for her heart. Perhaps sometime in her girlhood, she too had those "poor dreams" that are as sweet as they are fleeting, and that in their death, did all her trust and gentleness, for she seems to scorn in others, what with her must have been a vital reality.

However it is hardly fair to criticise a woman that I have never seen, and it is a mistaken idea that in writing a book one must necessarily write themselves.

I wish I could tell you something about the gaiety of the town, but I seldom go out—haven't been to the theatre since our Heron left us. What a magnificent woman she is!—but I scarcely like what is called par excellence her great character. I suppose few will agree with me in not liking Camille, but it seems to me merely a life of Passion, only relieved by a woman who is always coarse and always hungry. In Gamea I like Miss Heron much better, and am almost tempted to call her "unequaled."

I did intend to remark upon some of the new books but my pen has wandered at will, until both my paper and your patience are exhausted; so, in the language of a letter that I received last mail from a lady of some literary pretension, I will now "wind off." Perhaps if you treat me very well this time you will hear again from

MADGE WILD.

(For the Californian.)

OUR LITTLE ONES.

THEY gather around by the fire,
When the evening shadows grow long,
And their mother sings for her darlings
Her sweetest lullaby song.
In the quiet firelight's flicker
They kneel around by her knee,
And pray for the tenderest blessings
To fall upon "mother" and me.

My neck their arms are entwining,
And my heart grows wondrous weak,
The good-nights are tenderly whispered,
The kisses fall on my cheek;
And my foolish old eyes grow misty,
And shadows fill up the room,
Till the gleam of their white night-dresses,
Hath vanished into the gloom.

All day do our little ones wander,
Each holding the other one's hand,
And gather the fairest of flowers
In the Most Beautiful Land.
When the twilight deepens to night-time,
Their pattering footsteps come,
And the hour to us is sacred,
When we welcome our darlings home.

We see, on the evening of Christmas—
That day of heavenly grace—
A dear row of five little stockings
Hang up by the old fire-place;
And we fill them up to be brimming
With kisses, and blessings, and love,
And they're always gone in the morning,
And treasured with treasures above.

There are five little graves in the churchyard;
Five little ones hand in hand,
Stand, and wait by the gate Celestial
In the Most Beautiful Land.
There are five little hands that are beck'ning,
Five voices calling us home,
Ten dear little feet that are waiting
For father and mother to come.

And the goal grows nearer and nearer,
Our steps less feeble and slow;
Yet the storms of scarce fifty winters
Have piled up our heads with their snow.
Ah! our darlings gather around us,
When the evening shadows grow long,
And pray for, and kiss, and caress us,
And list to their mother's sweet song.

CLARA CLYDE.

SAN FRANCISCO, April 1st, 1865.

POOR CHANCE.—A Hebrew gentleman of this city told a rustic friend of his, last Saturday, en passant, that Matilda Heron was coming up and would appear in Gamea. "Wal," said the Josh, "I don't think she'll find much game here, unless it's snipe. Ducks is gettin' powerful scarce."—Stockton Record.

LOOK on upon the stars, my love,
And shame them with thine eyes
On which than on the lights above,
There hang more destinies.
Night's beauty is the harmony
Of blending shades and light;
Then, lady, up—look out and be
A sister to the night!

Sleep not!—thine image wakes for aye
Within my watching breast;
Sleep not!—from her soft sleep should fly,
Who robs all hearts of rest.
Nay, lady, from the slumbers break,
And make this darkness day,
With looks whose brightness well might make
Of darker nights a day.

THE VALENTINES FOR NUMBER TWENTY.

I CAME up from Hempton-in-the-Marshes to enter on what my stepfather called "the brilliant path of commerce," which, definitely speaking, was to occupy a clerk's stool in the counting-house of Hemp & Hall; great names cityward, as every one knows. "A great opening," this path of commerce was called by many people; but I cannot say I ever agreed with them. I took possession of the lodgings which Smithers, the head clerk, had taken for me, and of my stool in the office next morning, and thus began my London life. At first I liked the novelty of having rooms of my own; it was dignified to be able to ring the bell and find as much fault with the pudding as one chose, without being sternly commanded to eat and be thankful. Also the preserves and other good things which my dear mother had packed in a black box, were my own, and I confess I spared no exertions to empty the box as fast as possible. No step-father to cry "hold!" no stepfather's mother to prophesy I was certainly not born to be drowned!

Censorious people may blame the preserves; but I know it was the close confinement and sedentary life, after the country freedom of my previous life, which made me ill. And ill I was, with a vengeance! Ill in the beginning of December, and ill for many, many a day. Smithers sent me a doctor, and occasionally dropped in of an evening; but with this exception I spent day after day alone.

How dull it was! Mariana in the moated grange was gay compared to me! My only amusement was a circulating library—and even that was bad, for as I never knew what books to send for, I left the selection to the boy who gave them out; and I must say I soon learned to think of that cub as one of my natural enemies, so bad and stupid were the volumes he sent me. I tried various plans, such as taking the catalogue alphabetically; one day the first book in A, second day the first one in B, next day in C, and so on; but even that plan, as well as many others of a like kind I tried, failed. Consequently, to while away the tedious hours of the day, I was driven to staring out of the window—for I was not always confined to bed, but principally on a sofa in my sitting-room, which I ought here to mention was on the second floor of the house.

The view was certainly limited, but such as it was I made the most of it; and, as will be seen, I found for myself sermons in stones and good in everything.

Few houses in a street cover much area; the time had gone by for the street in which I lived to spare ground for houses with rooms on both sides of the hall door; once country villas may have stood on the site, or cottages with sweet briar hedges and beds of marigolds; but that was long ago, when Pepys wrote his diary, and the second Charles uttered wise saws and did foolish deeds.

Now it was a long, dull, narrow street, where the tall houses made heaven, as the child said, "a long way off," and one could look almost into their opposite neighbors' faces. In such a street a view is commanded in general of three houses—a good view—while a side glance of some half-dozen others can be obtained by the genteel practice of flattening your nose and one whisker against the window pane.

Of the three houses directly opposite me, kind Providence centred my interest on the middle one. For an infirm old lady, who never went out, occupied the one to the right, and a tiresome old bachelor, who was always out, the one to the left; so what could I do all day but stare at the middle one?

I soon found out how many occupants this house had, and that was a step gained. I knew the hours of their coming in; and if I did not guess accurately what they had for dinner, at least I knew the hour at which they ate it. I asked the servant what the name of the family was, and she stared at me as if I were "a infant phenomoner," with a plurality of heads. The acute reader will here call to mind the remark I made at a very early stage, that I was undoubtedly "from the country." Blessed be country towns, if one cares to know all about their opposite neighbors and every one else's opposite neighbors: such knowledge is chronic; but, alas! London yields no such ceaseless mine of conversation. The servant asked "missus," but missus looked at me as if I were slightly delirious, and answered me soothingly, as an invalid who ought not to be crossed, and went down stairs. Then I sent the willing slavey across the street, and she returned with the exciting news that No. 20 was on the hall door. But this helped me little; for on procuring last year's "Directory," I found No. 20 marked "vacant;" so my interesting inquiries were suddenly checked.

Then I thought of giving them a fancy name, and searched through a great many novels for a suitable one, but found none that fully satisfied me. All the names seemed indissolubly connected with certain characters, not at all resembling my ideal of the folks in No. 20.

There were four people living in this house, besides the servants—father, mother and two girls I concluded to be the daughters. Their drawing-room was a double room, just on a level with mine, but not so exactly opposite that I could not see the fireplace, near which, it being December, the ladies were generally grouped. When the folding doors stood open I had an excellent view, owing to the thorough light, and could see various pieces of furniture plainly. A piano, a couch, a work-frame, and flowers in the far-off drawing-room. I could see into the parlor, too; yea, even to the corner of the Times, which Paterfamilias read every morning, and I could see the young lady who poured out tea and coffee.

It was all very well to allow the family to give the young ladies Christian names. Easy as the task may appear, I had some difficulty in selecting suitable ones. To find two names for individuals of the opposite sexes might be easy enough; Abelard and Heloise, Romeo and Juliet, and many others; or of our own sex, Damon and Pythias, for instance; but the two young ladies fairly puzzled me. To give them common fancy names went against my grain, as the saying is; I must have something with character connected with it—some names, in fact, that carried a story with them. It may be that the loves of young ladies for each other are few in number, or not lasting, for there are not many on record. Even the friendship of the two whose names I finally selected, are placed on record only on the occasion of a serious misunderstanding. I thought of Rachel and Leah; but their mutual jealousies, and the deception practiced on poor Jacob at the end of his first seven years, made me reject these names and look out for something more suitable. Martha and Mary were rejected on the ground that neither young lady seemed to take exclusively to the role of Martha, both seeming to spend an equal amount of time over their plants, their piano, their books, and their embroidery. I thought also of Minna and Brenda, but my two gentle creatures seemed to have nothing in common with Magnus Troil's hardy children. At last, in a moment of inspiration—I could scarcely call it anything else—I bethought me of the Midsummer Night's Dream, and its two heroines, and I at once decided my two friends should be Helena and Hermia. That was a grand idea. The taller, and I concluded the elder, should be Helena, and the pretty little creature should be Hermia. I had always looked on Hermia as a small woman.

I found it much more comfortable for myself when their names were allotted. Thus, when they came down to the drawing-room before dinner, and, as they often did, sat on low seats and read by the firelight, it was so much pleasanter to say, "Helena has on her blue dress," or, "Oh, dear me! Hermia has finished her third volume already," instead of "the tall one," or "the short one." Every day they went out to walk unless it were very wet; and I used to be in a fever of impatience until they came in again; and if rain came on while they were out I was quite miserable until they came home, for fear of their being wet.

Thus days passed on until a few were only left before Christmas. I was not able to go home, and no one there seemed to care particularly whether I did or not. My mother wrote to me that my stepfather supposed I should soon be able to return to business, and going down to Hempton would only unsettle me, and that decided the thing. I remained indoors on my sofa, as I had been doing for two or three weeks.

My opposite neighbors were very busy all the week before Christmas. At first I wondered what the girls were about when for two mornings they never made their appearance in the drawing-room; and it was with a feeling of great joy I saw the gleam of their light dresses before dinner, and the books and seats by the fire as usual, until the father's knock and entrance brought dinner and a descent to the dining-room. It was very stupid of me not to remember that Christmas housekeeping had to be attended to, for I made myself most unutterably miserable with the fear that Helena and Hermia might be going away to spend Christmas, and that the mornings might be taken up packing in their own rooms.

At last I saw Hermia one morning in the drawing-room. She came in with a white apron on, and going to the secretary, took out some sheets of letter-paper which she proceeded to cut into various fancy patterns.

"It is for ornament," I cried, joyfully; "then they are going to spend this week at home, for what would be the use of making ornamental pastry, if they were going away?"

Miss Hermia spoiled two or three sheets of paper before she succeeded to her mind; but I admired the judicious way in which she burned her failures, and only went down stairs with her successes in her hand. At that very moment I had paper in my desk which would, I am sure, have been the very thing for her; and a hundred times at least during that day I wished I might have dared to offer it to her. Fancy the exquisite felicity of seeing her cut my paper! Even if it were to be chopped as fine as mince-meat and cast into a burning fiery furnace afterwards, what matter? Gladly would I have followed the fragments, could I have been satisfied that Hermia and her sister would have dropped a few tears just to extinguish the remains of my smouldering ashes; nay, one tear each, which would make only a pair between them, would have perfectly satisfied me. As it was, I could only pull over my desk and look at the paper, and handle it, and finally doze off in the midst of a brilliant chateau en Espagne, in which everything I had in the world (no great possessions, certainly) being used by the young ladies in No. 20, without any compunction or hesitation.

As I had nothing to look at in the evenings, the shutters across the way being then closed, I generally went very early to bed, and found the benefit of this arrangement in more ways than one. Indeed I, at that time of my life, slept such an amount of what old-fashioned folk are apt to term "beauty sleep," being the sleep had before twelve o'clock, P. M.—that the wonder is I did not become a perfect Adonis. I did not, however, and set down that theory from thenceforth in my list of "popular delusions."

But the principal advantage I derived from getting through a good deal of sleep early in the evening was, that I felt no desire to enjoy more in the morning, and was generally up and at my post of observation early, at least as soon as the family opposite were down for breakfast. So it fell out that on the morning of Christmas Eve I was at my window early. The servant had just retired after depositing my coffee-pot and toast upon the table, when a cab drove up to No. 20, and a visitor with some luggage arrived. Never shall I forget my feelings as I looked at that man. With a gasp I recognized him as my rival. In what? will naturally be asked, and as natural will be the answer, "I am sure I do not know." But sufficient it was that he was gaining access to that enchanted floor, and about to have social intercourse with those fair women who were but a dream to me. Shall I describe him? Even now—and some years have passed since then—his figure rises before me as he was that Christmas Eve, when I saw him for the first time, and hated him too.

He was tall (I am no great height myself) and slight, and dark—dark, yes, to the very moustache, which was like himself, thin. Then his dress, which I at once pronounced "snobby," was in keeping with his figure and style; and if he wore one thing worse than another it was leather gaiters. I hate leather gaiters! I have no patience with leather gaiters! I had rather an indifference to them before, now I hated them cordially. Hating the stranger as a whole, I think I cannot better describe him than by saying he was exactly the picture of the villain one sees on the stage. Of course he had a bass voice. I was sure I had heard such a voice a hundred times in melodramas. The real villain, the ruffian of deepest dye, never threatens his victim in a tenor voice—never, for the simple reason, "it would not take." Imagine being requested to deliver your watch in counter-tenor! Just as it is the proper thing for peasants who come out in picturesque costume to walk, crossing their legs, as they did in Leah the other night when I went to see Miss Bateman. I felt certain, from the moment I knew peasants were inevitable, that they would come out crossing their legs as they walked, and that they did, I leave to the unbiased judgment of all who went in '64 to see the transatlantic charmer.

It took away all my appetite for breakfast—and mine was pretty cool when I turned to it—to see how they received that man. Every one came out to welcome him, father, mother and daughters. The father clapping him on the back and wringing his hand, the mother kissing him, and the two maid-servants quarrelling for the honor of carrying his portmanteau. And, what was worse than all, I am afraid I saw him kiss the girls just as the hall door was being shut. What I could see of the breakfast tactics only made me worse. Helena made tea, and Hermia danced attendance on him. Through one window I could see her stoop over the fender, bringing away successive hot plates, while through the other I could see their destination was to be heaped up with choice viands for the diabolical stranger.

Was it to be wondered at that my appetite was destroyed by contemplating this scene? How could a fellow crack his egg with proper discretion under such circumstances? I did not crack mine, for I reduced both it and the egg-cup to small fragments at one blow; for inasmuch as on this villain's arrival I had hated him from the crown of his horrid wide-awake to the buttons of his detestable leather gaiters, I now hated him cordially to the heels (military) of his boots.

Then he must go out to walk with them! nothing less would do, and bring them home in a cab (which was heaped up with holly) just before it grew dark. I saw a sheet spread on the drawing-room floor, and the dark shiny branches piled upon it, and then the girls, with the villain's aid, began to decorate the lamps and picture-frames.

What a blessing I was awake when this little play began, and what a happy hour they chose for it! The girls had on their white dresses, and floated about from mirror to picture, from picture to lamp, like the Peris in the illustrated Lalla Rookh. Then it was I learned a secret which toned down my burning hatred, and left only a strong dislike in its place.

Helena stood on a chair and dressed the lamp; probably she took this duty on account of her superior height; perhaps the villain recommended it, for he stood beside her, and, breaking the holly and pelletrie into small pieces, handed them up to her. Hermia fitted about the room doing such work as came within the reach of her short arms when standing on a chair. I could see the gleam of her dress as, after putting up her sprays, she would jump down, and, moving back, look at the effect from a little distance, and then dart forward and push some refractory stems out of sight. Then I saw her take an armful of the evergreens and descend to the dining-room to continue her work there. I was so engaged in watching her, and the strong fire lighted up the room so gloriously—I could see the very flowers in her hair—that I forgot to give any attention to the progress of the drawing-room decorations, but when I did look I saw more than was meant for the eye of the public.

Honor bright! with the golden rule in my memory, I am not going to betray a confidence so unwittingly given. If the villain never committed a crime of greater magnitude than to stand steadying Miss Helena by encircling her waist with his arms, all forgiveness to his memory! It is not for me to cast the first stone. I have done worse things myself in my day. Nor was it exactly extortion, the villain exacting toll for lifting the young lady down from her high position and replacing her in it.

Once Hermia caught them in the act of balancing their debtor and creditor account in this fashion. She may have laughed, but I could not hear it, only I saw the gesture of amazement, the uplifted hands, and could fancy some lively sally at the lovers' expense, when she ran from the room closely followed by the indignant villain, who seemed to demand instant vengeance. That she had made her escape I doubt not, for the next moment I saw her opening the hall door to her father, when his familiar knock awakened up the quiet street. Then with what interest I watched them all assemble for dinner round the drawing-room fire. Helena and her villain stood far apart at different sides of the group, but I could follow Hermia's face as it turned from one culprit to the other, as if threatening them, and more than once Helena shook her head and finger at her when it could be done without observation. Of course the rest of the evening could only be imagined, as the curtains were drawn, but I pictured it to myself, and out of it I took a desperate resolve.

I would go to church next day. Not to any church at all, but to the one to which my dear friends went, and the idea possessed me so entirely I could scarcely sleep. The doctor only came every other day, and he had been with me on Christmas Eve, so there was no fear of his finding me out, unless I told him; and the next morning I was up and dressed betimes. I sent for a cab, and had it at the door ready to start when the ladies opposite came out; and then getting in, I desired the driver to keep them in sight, and take me to the church to which he would see them go.

I followed them closely in, and was so fortunate as to get a seat quite near enough to watch them all. Never did alchemist watch a crucible with more eagerness than I watched them all through the service, and still with such discretion as to prevent them observing it. I wanted to see if their faces were like what I had pictured in my imagination; but I am bound in all honesty to say they were far more attractive, Hermia's especially. The father was some seats off, as there was not room for him in the pew with the others; but for weeks after I could not help wondering if Hermia saw what I saw, viz., that during the sermon there were three hands in Helena's muff which had decidedly been only made for two. I paid dearly for going to church that day, and I was so much worse the next that the doctor found out what I had done, and very nearly gave me up. I was confined to bed for several weeks, and though once or twice, with the help of the furniture, I crawled to the window, I could see nothing of my friends in No. 20.

The second week in February, I was back on my sofa again; but whether I was stupid, or whether the habits of the family had undergone a change in the mean time, I saw little of them; and was sure to be asleep, or away from the window, whenever they went in or out, so I seldom saw them.

It was the twelfth of February, and I had finished the reading of the paper, even to the last of the advertisements, and found myself pondering over it in a most unaccountable way. It treated of valentines, and described, in glowing terms, how cheap, and brilliant, and loving, and original they could be had at a certain shop not a hundred miles distant from where I then sat.

"Cheap!" I said, indignantly; "the man who would buy a nasty, gaudy, filigree Cupid to send to a girl deserves to be sent to Coventry. If I were a girl I would despise a fellow who could not speak for himself, I would," I said, vehemently, bringing down my clenched fist with a bang on the table at my elbow. "It is a penny-a-line love, and he might keep it for me. Give me a real, original set of verses, to the point, and written solely for myself, that would touch my feelings!" Then I pictured some silly fellow sending a bought valentine to Hermia, and my indignation at the picture I had myself conjured up all but took away my breath. To Hermia! I writhed at the thought. Just such a thing as the villain would do! I said, and my old hatred to him woke up fiercely at the bare supposition. As I thus tortured myself with possibilities, scarcely even probabilities, of others worshipping at the same shrine I did, an idea suddenly burst upon me. "By Jove, I shall send her one myself! I shall send them each one, and no one can accuse me of undue partiality!" (the acute reader will have detected long before this the state of my young affections.) "But," I said, "I shall make sure of Hermia's first; I might fall asleep, or have a fit, or something that would prevent me writing a second; and that my lack of confidence in my own muse was justified by its rapid exhaustion, the readers will soon see. To choose a metre, to choose a subject, to fit my rhymes—why need I dwell on these threadbare anxieties of the youthful aspirant to poetic fame? At last, having been guided in the first, by my choice of the second, an Irish legend I had read years before, I indited the following verses to Hermia, and I hope I shall receive a pardon on the score of my youth when I freely confess that I thought them very fine indeed, and far, very far beyond the average:

"My little neighbor, lend a pretty ear,
And I will tell a little tale romantic;
In far-off seas I found it long ago,
Amid the surges of the wild Atlantic.

"Two islets lie there gleaming side by side,
But severed by a channel full of danger;
So fair and white that the tongue of far-off times
Called them 'The Joyless Maidens of the Stranger.'

"For there beneath the waters calm and fair
That gird the sisters round with azure zones,
Lie rotting ribs of many a goodly ship,
And many a sturdy seaman's whitening bones.

"And now a beacon stands on either rock
To guide the wanderer on the treacherous sea;
In each, when first I knew them long ago,
A solitary keeper used to be.

"Yet not alone; for each one had a child,
A boy that burrowed like a rabbit in the sand,
A girl that trimmed the lamp, and kept the house,
And gathered 'John o' Groats' and escallops on the strand.

"Of course you seize my story by the end,
The 'how it came about,' you can't, I hope.
Pray grant me patience in my maudering tale.
Don't laugh—I'll tell you—'twas a telescope!

"For the boy growing unto man's estate,
Spent many an hour gazing through a glass,
Watching a little nook upon the shore,
Where daily was the maiden wont to pass.

"And presently he launched a little skiff,
Made from some sendrift east upon the shore,
And spread abroad his tiny cloud of sail,
And sailed away to sunny Mullin-Mor.

"But I must reach my moral, so shall skip
The tender meeting on the yellow strand,
And tell you how it fell upon a day,
The lovers wandered seaward hand in hand.

"And still she cried, 'Say, Owen, am I fair?'
And as he answered his rough voice grew soft,
And gravely said, 'Yes, dearest; fair to me';
As he had answered many a time and oft.

"Then suddenly she plucked her hand away,
And flung at him a pretty pucker'd frown;
'Am I not fair in other eyes?' she cried;
'Fair as the maidens in the far-off town!'

"And as he gravely smiled, he took her hand,
And answer made: 'Nay, 'tis a thing of taste;
I loved you ere I touched this plump round arm,
Or laid a finger on your dainty waist.

"'Loved ere I knew a feature of your face,
Was blind before I saw the dimple there.
What if my love's a ghoul to all beside!
So, dearest, you are still my fairest fair.

Then I transcribed the verses with great care, writing the seventh verse and the last in huge capitals, that they might point the moral I felt a delicacy in drawing more openly, and I considered this as a decidedly telling hit.

By this time my poor Muse was pumped dry. Yet still undaunted, I cried, "Now for Helena's! Doubtless the villain will write her half a dozen, at least, so I shall confine myself to a réchauffé; some good standard verses will be very respectful and respectable." So I cast about in my mind what poet should be honored by selecting from. Of right, I ought to have told her "her eyes were lodestars, and her tongue's sweet air, etc.," but I had never heard her tongue, and what swayed me most of all was that the rest of the passage was exceedingly unmanageable.

I took down Tommy Moore, but the Hibernian bard was so hackneyed, and I got so tired of his everlasting howl about liberty and wine, that I dropped him over the back of my sofa; and leaving him on the floor, fell to work on Byron. He was endless, enough to confuse one's brain to search him, so I hurled him after his dear Tommy, and tried Shelly. "I arise from dreams of thee," is good, but worn out, and, besides, too strong for a Bravo's Bride, as I had now accustomed myself to consider Helena to be; I read the last lines, thought of Christmas Eve, and that "she was another's," and sent Shelly after his friend Byron.

At this period of my life I was much given to poetry, and had cheap copies of all the popular poems of the day. Yet I found it very hard to select one. The good verses were too common; the bad too bad. Then in my search I crossed the Atlantic, and in a happy hour took down the works of Edgar Allan Poe, a cheap copy, now, alas! out of print, in fancy (very) boards, with a good deal of scarlet and yellow on the covers.

Here I found the nicest, tiniest set of verses, and so near the end of the book, that I flattered myself it was not every fellow who had read so far. These are the lines I wrote out for Helena, drawing a fine capital letter at the beginning of each verse, in what I then considered a very high style of art.

Some apology is due to the well-educated reader for the insertion of verses I have since discovered are exceedingly common; but it may just chance that some greenhorn, in the same state of blessed ignorance that I then was, may be among my readers; so for him I transcribe, and to him dedicate my verses.

"Helen! thy beauty is to me
Like those Nicean barks of yore,
That gently o'er a perfumed sea
The weary wayworn wanderer bore
To his own native shore.

"On desperate seas long wont to roam,
Thy hyacinth air, thy classic face,
Thy Naiad airs have brought me home
To the glory that was Greece,
And the grandeur that was Rome.

"See in yon brilliant window niche
How statue-like I see thee stand,
The agate lamp within thy hand.
Ah! Psyche, from the regions which Are holy land."

My brains had been so much taxed in producing Hermia's original valentine, that I felt very happy indeed to be able to produce Helena's at such a cheap rate; and really, when these verses were all fairly written out in an ornamental style, I felt quite as proud of them as if they were indeed my very own composition; nay, at times, I began to imagine they were little airy trifles I had thrown off in moments stolen from severer studies, and not Edgar Allan Poe's at all.

I put each valentine into an envelope, and the two envelopes into one larger one, sealing it with a very large seal that had been my grandfather's in days when old gentlemen wore their watches with a bunch of seals attached to them by a broad black ribbon.

To address a letter to people whose names I did not know, may to some people appear a difficulty; but I soon got over that.

"To the young ladies at
'No. 20, ——— Street,
'(One each,)"

seemed a simple solution of the difficulty; and to bed at last I went, very tired, but very proud of my night's work.

The next day, the 13th, I determined they should be posted; and, after keeping the letter back until it was impossible it could be delivered before the next morning, I sent the servant to drop it into the nearest pillar-post.

Up to this time, not a doubt of the propriety of thus intruding my muse on people I did not know had ever crossed my mind. To be impertinent was my last thought; and the whole business was so much an effusion of feeling, that I overlooked the possible appearance of the matter to a cool matter-of-fact Paterfamilias of the nineteenth century. Suffice it to say that, besides my feelings being strongly enlisted in my own behalf, I had sufficient self-conceit to pass the rest of the evening in a state of tranquility and egotistical meditation which a king might envy, or a prime minister, on the eve of a dissolution, covet.

It was about twelve o'clock the next day, when, a new batch of novels having arrived from my foe at the circulating library, I had curled myself up on the sofa to make an inspection of the parcel, and decide which volume should be honored by the first perusal, when the door opened, and my landlady's "slavey" announced "a gentleman."

Now, a visitor, especially at this hour, was an unprecedented occurrence. Occasionally, of an evening, some of my fellow-clerks would drop in; but a caller at noon was a world's wonder. But, fancy my astonishment, when I recognized Helena and Hermia's father. I got white and red by turns; jumped off the sofa, staggered, almost fell, and gasped out an invitation to my visitor to be seated. He took the chair I pointed to; and I took one despairing look at his face. One glance was enough. In it I read how my impertinence was about to be punished; figuratively speaking, I saw he had on the black cap. For the first time I saw my conduct in its true light. Yes, before one word had been spoken on either side.

"Your name, I believe, is Bennett?" tho Herrpapa said first.

"Yes," I said, pumping up my courage, and, though feeling dreadfully guilty, determined to face the matter like a man. "Yes, Gilbert Bennett."

There was a long pause. Either of us must break it; and I said in my heart, "No. 20, let it be you."

"Mr. Bennett," at last he said: "I am going to ask you a question as a gentleman, and I expect you to answer me as such."

I bowed my head in an ashamed silence.

He took a letter from his pocket, and, unfolding the contents—two sheets—laid envelope and all before me on the table.

"Did you write those?"

With a great effort, swallowing my feelings at a gulp, I said, "Yes, sir."

"And what have you to say in defence of yourself, Mr. Bennett?"

"Say!" I cried: "I have nothing to say, sir, except that I did not mean it as impertinence."

"It seems," he said, with a half-sneer, "that you succeeded in that without much effort."

"Sir," I said, interrupting him, "I have been half mad with illness and loneliness; I have had no other pleasure for three months, but seeing them go in and out; that is the only plea I have to offer."

"Yes," he said, "you must have been half mad, indeed, to have presumed so far."

"Until you came into the room, it never occurred to me I had done what was wrong; believe me, I would not offend them so for worlds; as I told you before, they are the only pleasure I have had in life all these months."

"By 'them' may I understand you mean my daughters?"

"Yes," I said; "and the days I do not see them I am unutterably miserable, and at night I cannot sleep."

This was putting it strong; but I thought I saw signs of his wrath being appeased, and tried the despairing penitente dodge.

"Then, when you sent these verses, you did it in all sincerity?"

"On my honor as a gentleman, I did."

"I cannot understand it at all," No. 20 said, looking at me as if I were a dangerous lunatic who might at any moment become outrageous and unmanageable.

"I should like to put a few questions to you, Mr. Bennett. What do you know of my daughters? Where did you first see them?"

I began at the beginning, and told him—not everything I had seen, but everything I had felt, since I had first observed my opposite neighbors; showed him my post of observation; and wound up with an abject apology, bringing all manner of special pleading to bear on my own case.

"And now," I said, "will you have the apology in writing?" And as I spoke I drew my desk over to me and opened it.

"No," he said; "for two reasons I shall dispense with that. First, because you answered me like a gentleman, without evasion or subterfuge; and secondly, because you are young, and, I do believe, have done this thoughtlessly, without intent to offend, and are very unlikely to do such a thing again. But, I tell you candidly, I must take some means to prevent such a system of espionage being successful in future. The privacy of domestic life must not be invaded by one's opposite neighbors. I am going down to a furnishing-house to-day, to order blinds which shall effectually check your prying in future."

"As you put it, I agree with you," I said, mournfully; "and no punishment could be too great; but still—"

"Still what?" he asked, as I hesitated.

"If you would only trust me," I said, "I give you my word of honor that, cost what it may, the blinds shall be on my window, and not on yours. I shall cease to watch your house from this day; and, if you are still doubtful of me, I shall change my lodgings. You do not know what such a promise costs me; probably you set a light value on it."

He pondered for a few minutes, and then, as if he had not heard me, asked me—

"Where do you come from?"

From Hempton-in-the-Marshes. My father is dead, and my mother has married again. My father was rector of Hempton; and I only wish my stepfather was more like him. I should never have been here," I cried angrily; "but he persuaded my mother against letting me go to college."

"What was your father's college?" No. 20 said, more courteously than he had yet spoken.

"St. John's, Oxford," I said, proudly; "and he distinguished himself there, too."

"I remember him," said my visitor; "I am a St. John's man myself; and there could scarcely have been two Gilbert Bennetts. Yes, I knew him well."

"Then," I said, vehemently, rising to my feet, "I am ten times more sorry for having insulted your family; if anything had been wanting to bring me to a sense of my unworthiness, you have done it by speaking of my father. I wish you would tell me how I could make reparation, sir. I am ready to do anything in my power."

"Well, boy," he said, "you do appear sorry; and I am bound to believe your father's son. I accept your promise about the windows; but remember, it is to be carried out in the spirit as well as the letter."

I groaned an assent.

"And now," he continued, "half forgiveness is unjust; I shall tell you further what I expect; that when you are well enough to go out, you will come across and dine with us, and make the acquaintance of your divinities behind the blinds. They are very good girls; but the best cure for you is to know them closely, and I venture to say you will not find them half so charming as your imagination has pictured."

For a moment I was speechless.

"You do not mean it!" I cried, joyfully.

"I generally mean what I say. When will you be able to come?"

"How good of you, sir! I can come any day. I am quite well enough for that."

"Very well, let it be to-day. Sharp six. You know the house," he added, laughing.

"But, sir," I said, almost beside myself, "your name? May I ask your name?"

"My name is Walton. Good morning, Mr. Bennett." And my visitor took his leave.

Here was a wind-up to the affair. When the hall door shut, I got up on the table and gave three cheers. I was just about to rush to the window, to see whether he went straight home, or, as usual, into the City, when I remembered my promise, and slunk into my bedroom, as much depressed as possible, considering I had such a delightful prospect before me for the evening.

My first act was to take out my evening suit of clothes, which had not seen the light since I left the maternal home. My next was to brush them thoroughly, a piece of labor which can only be appreciated by a person in the weak state of health in which I then was. But was I not going to dine at No. 20?

Never, not even on my wedding morning, (a few months ago) did I bestow such care on my toilet as on that memorable occasion. I sent out and purchased six new white ties, but after trying them all, one after another, and being dissatisfied with the result, was obliged to go in an ordinary black one.

Grief the First.

Then my collar was unsatisfactory. How is it that laundresses will not turn over a fellow's collars close up to the band, both corners alike? I profanely wished my washerwoman certain punishments nameless to ears polite.

Collars were Grief the Second.

Then my neckstud rolled away, and find it I could not, though I searched every corner.

Grief the Third.

But grief of griefs, worst of all, when I got into my coat, I found I had grown so much since my illness that the cuff of the coat came barely to where the cuff of my shirt began.

Grief the Fourth. In a word, I was in a fever of despair long before my toilet was completed, and barely able to drag my weary limbs across the street about five minutes before six o'clock.

Had I been stronger and heartier, I might have detected a smirk, slightly subdued, on the face of the maid who showed me up-stairs, for I believe my history had even reached the basement story of No. 20; but I was too exhausted by such unwonted exertion to be conscious of anything but that an introduction was before me to Helena and Hermia.

I advanced into the drawing-room, saw four people, had my hand shaken by Mr. Walton, and in one great effort to make three bows to three ladies, staggered and fell fainting against some, Paterfamilias, I believe. When I recovered consciousness I was on the sofa, and Mr. Walton standing by me, Mrs. Walton was giving me a glass of wine, and Hermia stood at a little distance with the decanter in her hand.

I blurted out some apology, and Mr. Walton said in a good-humored, kindly way:

"Well, you are a pretty fellow! This is what you call being quite able to go out to dinner! I have a good mind to tell your doctor!"

But I declared I was perfectly well, and only a little giddy with being unaccustomed to the open air, and was very indignant at not being believed. I was not allowed to go down to dinner; but the parlor maid (now minus the smirk) brought me up some soup, of which no praises could be too great; after my landlady's watery decoctions, this was indeed nectar. Other things equally good followed, and I fell asleep at last, not without a slight dread that I might have been asleep all the time, and would awake presently in my own lodgings.

I did not, however, but awoke in No. 20, to see Helena and Hermia reading by the firelight, as I had seen them dozens of times before. I was afraid to stir, lest it should break the spell that was over me, but lay watching them and wishing every minute would be an hour long.

Then the parents came up, and we had lights, and a little music of the pleasantest soothing kind. I never hear Mozart's masses without remembering that evening; and when the "Agnus Dei" from the First Mass is played by any one, even now, I feel that inexpressible peace stealing over my soul that fell upon it that night, when I heard Helena Walton touch it for the first time so tenderly, with a deep feeling of its wondrous beauty shining out of every sentence.

I went home at last. Mr. Walton saw me into my own room, and charged me to go at once to bed, and though I obeyed him sleep was out of the question.

Not so charming as I imagined! Yes, a hundred times more charming! No wonder I could not sleep. Again and again came the picture of the drawing-room I had left; Mr. Walton lying in an armchair by the fire, telling me I need not talk unless I felt quite able and inclined, Hermia and her mother at their work, with Hermia's head bent over hers just within my view, and Helena at the piano, heightening the beauty and enjoyment of the scene.

Next day I was too tired to rise; but in the evening Mr. and Mrs. Walton kindly came over to see me; I was in the drawing-room, then, and Mrs. Walton honored me by pouring out tea for us, though I own to feeling for the first time that the cups were coarse and common, and that the bread in a cheap japanned bread-basket was not what she was accustomed to.

After this, I spent many an evening at No. 20, and the girls and I became fast friends, even to laughing over the two valentines, which, at their urgent entreaty, I returned to them, for Mr. Walton had left them with me the day he called. I was soon established on that confidential footing in the family, which acknowledges, as an undoubted fact, that the visitor was to have the privilege of mending the pens, glueing the work-boxes, splicing the fans, and going the messages, and, ah! happy fate! last Christmas, I went with them to Covent Garden for the holly, and entered into violent competition with the villain (who properly was called Smith) and Helena in the matter of decorating—they persisting in declaring Hermia and I were a pair of bunglers.

These were not their real names, however, though I have loved to call them so throughout my story. She whom I called Helena was properly Joan, and the fairy Hermia had been baptized Agnes; and I lay down my pen to laugh at the recollection of the evening when my thus naming them came to be known.

I had come one evening uninvited, saying, as an excuse to Mrs. Walton, that I had brought Miss Helena some crests and monograms, and Miss Hermia some Honolulu postage stamps.

Miss Helena and Miss Hermia? Mamma Walton said, inquiringly.

I stammered out, "Your daughters," which satisfied her, not being of an exquisite disposition; but I told the girls afterwards, amusing them no little.

I said, "You know when I am here I address you as Miss Agnes; but when I am at home I still think of you as Hermia."

And this anecdote was soon added to the list of jests we had in common; and if I brought two bouquets, as I often did when I knew a party was approaching, I ticketed them, "Helena's" and "Hermia's."

In due course of time Joan became Mrs. Smith, and went off northwards with the villain, and about the same time I became, how it matters not, a man of independent means.

St. Valentine's Day was drawing near again, only a few weeks off, and I was sitting in the dining-room, after dinner, with Mr. and Mrs. Walton and Hermia.

"You will only have one valentine to send this year, Gilbert," Mr. Walton said, with a sigh. "It used to be 'one each,' eh? Ah! we shall miss Joan!"

"By Jove!" I said to myself, "here is an opening not to be despised."

"No, sir," I said, "I am going to ask you for a valentine for myself. I am sure you know as well as I do I want Hermia—I mean Agnes. You and Mrs. Walton know me so well now and I have nothing to say, but that I shall try every day to be more worthy of her."

I was too husky to say more, and Agnes having slipped from the room, I had lost a good deal of courage.

There was a little silence, and Mr. Walton shook my hand silently.

"It is what we fathers come to," he said.

I rose and went to where Mrs. Walton sat by the fire in an arm-chair. There were tears on her face.

"And you?" I asked tremblingly.

"Agnes must decide," she said; and though I knew how that would be, I was glad of the permission to make my escape, and going up stairs, found her sitting by the drawing-room fire.

She had not expected me up so soon, but there was no need to ask her then, for I knew it long before, that I had found my real valentine.

I got her altogether into my care on the next St. Valentine's Day, and we were then, and are now, as happy as the summer day is long.

My wife signs herself Agnes Bennett; it is legally her name; but when we sit together by our own fireside, her hand in mine, or, better still, she sits upon my knee, I call her by the name by which I knew her first—and loved her—Hermia.

A SCOTTISH LOVE SONG.

DEAR CALIFORNIAN.—Haven't you carefully hidden away in some nook or corner of your heart a weakness for Scottish love-songs? Then you can appreciate one which I saw a day or two ago, and which I herewith send you. It went to my heart with its delicate, tender pathos, so quaintly expressed. It appeared originally, I think, in Chambers' Scottish Songs. I do not know the name of the author, but whoever he may be, this should make him famous. Don't you think so?

Oh, I'm wat, wat,
Oh, I'm wat and weary;
Yet fain would I rise and rin,
If I thoct I would meet my dearie!

Aye waukin' O!
Waukin' aye, and weary;
Sleep I can get none,
For thinkin' o' my dearie!

Simmer's a pleasant time,—
Flowers o' every color;
The winter rins ower the heugh,
And I long for my true lover.

When I sleep I dream,
When I wauk I'm eerie—
Sleep I can get none,
For thinkin' o' my dearie.

Lonely nicht comes on,
'A' the lave are sleepin';
I think upon my love,
And blear my c'eu wi' greetin'.

Feather beds are soft,
Pentit rooms are bonnie;
But ae kiss o' my true love
Better's far than ony.

Oh, for Friday night—
Friday at the gloamin';
Oh, for Friday night—
Friday's long a' comin'.

Burns tried to improve the above, but failed decidedly. As well "gild refined gold," or do anything else foolish. Now, don't you think it is a gem? I do.

FLOWERS.

OF flowers, so much has been said and sung that it would seem almost impossible to write anything. They have been called "the joy of the shrubs which bear them," "the stars of the earth," and "the alphabet of the angels;" indeed, as Mr. Howitt says, "of all the minor creations of God, they seem to be most completely the effusions of His love of beauty, grace and joy. Beauty and fragrance are poured abroad over the earth in blossoms of endless varieties, radiant evidences of the boundless benevolence of the Deity. They are made solely to gladden the heart of man, for a light to his eyes, for a living inspiration of grace to his spirit, for a perpetual admiration." As Brainard has expressed it,

"Who does not love a flower?
Its hues are taken from the light
Which summer's suns fling pure and bright,
In scattered and prismatic hues,
That smile and shine in dropping dews;
Its fragrance from the sweetest air,
Its form from all that's light and fair—
Who does not love a flower?"

With what eagerness do very infants grasp at flowers! As they become older they would live forever among them; as they grow up to maturity flowers assume in their eyes new characters and beauties; then there is strewn around them the poetry of the earth. They become invested by a multitude of associations, with innumerable spells of power over the human heart; they are to us memorials of the joys, sorrows, hopes and triumphs of our forefathers; they are to all nations the emblems of youth in its loveliness and purity.

Gardens have been the delight of poets in all ages. All our poets have sung of flowers. They serve all purposes; and we are reminded of the fable of the flowers, where the rose says:

What can a poet do without us?

But it is not poets alone who do worship to flowers. What an enthusiastic devotion is that which sends a man from the attractions of home and the ties of neighborhood, the bonds of country, to range plains, valleys, hills and mountains for a new flower! What spirit must have animated Hermann, Hasselquist, Tournefort, Linnaeus, Solander, Saussure, Humboldt and hundreds of others, who have sacrificed every personal convenience and selfish motive for the sake of illustrating the volume of nature, and opening almost a new existence upon those whose researches are necessarily limited! There is not a plant or flower but has a history, and when this is known it becomes doubly interesting. For instance, the Jasmine, (Jasminum officinale). Cowper says:

"The jasmine throwing wide her elegant sweets—

The deep dark green of whose varnished leaf
Makes more conspicuous, and illumines more
The bright profusion of her scatter'd stars."

The Jasmine seems as though it had been created to express the quality of amiability. When first introduced into France, by some Spanish navigators about the year 1560, it was greatly admired for the lightness of its branches and the delicate lustre of its star-like flowers. It was deemed necessary to place a plant so elegant and apparently tender in the hot-house; anon it was tried in the orangery, where it grew marvellously well, and at length it was exposed in the open ground where it now grows as freely as in its native soil.

The flexible branches of this odoriferous shrub may be trained according to our pleasure; it will climb and weave itself around our trellised arches and cover dead walls with an evergreen tapestry. It can be trained in any form, and it lavishes upon us an abundant harvest of flowers of the most delightful perfume.

"Then how serene! when in your favorite room, Gales from your jasmies soothe the evening gloom."

This beautiful plant grew in Hampton Court garden at the end of the seventeenth century, but being lost there was known only in Europe in the garden of the Grand Duke of Tuscany at Pisa. From a jealous and selfish anxiety that he should continue to be the sole possessor of a plant so charming and so rare, he strictly charged his gardener not to give a single sprig or even a flower to any person. The gardener might have been faithful if he had not loved; but being attached to a fair though portionless damsel, he presented her with a bouquet on her birthday, and, in order to render it more acceptable, ornamented it with a sprig of Jasmine. The young maiden, to preserve the freshness of this pretty stranger, placed it in the earth where it remained green until the return of spring, when it budded forth and was covered with flowers. She had profited by her lover's lesson, and now cultivated her highly prized jasmine with care, for which she was amply repaid by its rapid growth. The poverty of the lovers had been a bar to their union. Now, however, by the sale of cuttings from the plant which love had given her, she amassed a little fortune, which she bestowed with her hand upon the gardener of her heart.

The young girls of Tuscany in remembrance of this adventure, always deck themselves on their wedding-day with a bouquet of jasmine, and they have a proverb that "She who is worthy to wear a nosegay of jasmies, is as good as a fortune to her husband." Ought we not, then, to cultivate more generally what love first scattered abroad? For Cotton observes, how numerous are the purposes to which it may be applied:

"Here jasmine spreads the silver flower
To deck the wall or weave the bower."

Carrington, one of nature's poets, makes it expressive of sympathy,

"The jasmine droops above the honored dead."

The seed of the jasmine will not ripen here, but the plant may be increased by layering down the branches or by cuttings.

IRIS.

AN honest but not very astute individual received written directions from a bereaved husband, living at a distance, to erect a tombstone over the grave of his deceased wife, a copy of the desired inscription being sent in a letter. The agent unfortunately allowed a postscript addressed to himself to remain attached to the inscription, which consequently stands thus:

CAROLINE,
WIFE OF WILLIAM SMITH,
Died Oct. 4, 1864.
AGED 52.
Rest in peace.

If you will attend to the matter you will confer a great favor upon
WILLIAM SMITH,
Husband of the above.

WORK FOR 1865.—The Charivari publishes a woodcut representing Old Father Time giving directions to the year 1865, represented as a little child having its eyes filled with tears, and in great apparent distress. "There is no use in weeping," says he, with the hour-glass and scythe, "You have your work to do. You see all that?" pointing to various disjointed articles lying around in confusion, and bearing the names of Venetia, Uolstein, Poland, Italy, the United States, Hungary, San Domingo, Mexico, etc. "You see all that? Well, then, you must at once commence by setting the whole in order, for I cannot allow that every one should constantly cry after me for doing nothing."

George McComb (says the Auburn Stars and Stripes of the 29th ult.) was caught by a cave from a bank at which he was working, and had his leg broken about half-way between the knee and ankle joints. The accident occurred at Dornic Hill about one mile from Auburn.

Our sins are like the dragon's teeth sown by Cadmus; they rise up against us in the shape of men armed for our destruction.

A MAN coming home late one night, a little more than "half seas o'er," feeling thirsty, procured a glass of water and drank it. In doing so he swallowed a small ball of silk that lay in the bottom of the tumbler, the end catching in his teeth. Feeling something in his mouth, and not knowing what it was, he began pulling at the end, and the little ball unrolling, he soon had several feet in his hands, and still no end, apparently. Terrified, he shouted at the top of his voice, "Wife! wife! I say, wife, come here! I am all unraveling!"

NOVEL NEWSPAPER PROSPECTUS.—The editor of the Contemporaneo, on the occasion of the New Year, sends the following "bulletin to his subscribers:" "My paper enters on its sixth year; it still carries high the banner which has victoriously come out of so many struggles—34 seizures, fines amounting to 7,389 lire, 664 days in jail, my house taken by storm, my property sacked, and my reputation torn to tatters. These are my claims to public support."

THE question of Mr. Tennyson's baronetcy is still an open one in England. A letter from an official to the London Daily News, on the subject, contains the following sentences: "I am enabled, on the best authority, to assert that her Majesty has signified her gracious desire to confer some honor upon the Poet-Laureate." * * * "It is due to those who have reported and commented on the subject, to assert that, whether the Queen's intentions take the form assigned them by the vox populi, or not, the report itself possesses a solid foundation in fact."

PUTTING DOWN A BULLY.—A singular incident occurred at the Café Français in 1816, at the corner of the Rue Lafitte. A celebrated duelist entered, and began insulting all the persons who were seated at dinner. He boasted of his courage, and declared his determination to kill a certain M. de F—. A gentleman present, disgusted at such braggart insolence, quietly walked up to this fire-eater, and addressed him thus: "As you are such a dangerous customer, perhaps you will accommodate me by being punctual at the entrance of the Bois de Boulogne, near the Porte Maillot, at mid-day to-morrow; earlier I cannot get there, but depend upon my arriving in due time with swords and pistols." The duelist began to demur, saying he did not know what right a stranger had to take up the cudgels of M. de F—; to which the gentleman replied: "I have done so because I am anxious to rid society of a dangerous fellow like yourself, and would recommend you before you go to bed to make your will. I will undertake to order your coffin and pay your funeral expenses." He then gave the waiter a note of 1000 francs, with the injunction that his orders should be executed before eleven the following day. This had the desired effect of intimidating the bully, who left Paris the following morning, and never more was heard of or seen in public.

HOW TO DRESS FOR A PHOTOGRAPH.—A lady or gentleman, having made up her or his mind to be photographed, naturally considers, in the first place, how to be dressed, so as to show off to the best advantage. Let me offer a few words of advice touching dress. Orange color, for certain optical reasons, is, photographically, black; blue is white; other shades or tones of colors are proportionately darker or lighter as they contain more or less of these colors. The progressive scale of photographic color commences with the lightest. The order stands thus: white, light blue, violet, pink, mauve, dark blue, lemon, blue-green, leather-brown, drab, cerise, Magenta, yellow-green, dark-brown, purple, red, amber, morone, orange, dead-black. Complexion has to be much considered in connection with dress. Blondes can wear much lighter colors than brunettes; the latter always present better pictures in dark dresses, but neither look well in positive white. Violent contrasts of color should be especially guarded against. In photography, brunettes possess a great advantage over their fairer sisters. The lovely, golden tresses lose all their transparent brilliancy, and are represented black; while the "bonnie blue e'e," theme of rapture to the poet, is misery to the photographer—for it is put entirely out. The simplest and most effective way of removing the yellow color from the hair is to powder it nearly white; it is thus brought to about the same photographic tint as in nature. The same rule, of course, applies to complexion. A freckle, quite invisible at a short distance, is, on account of its yellow color, rendered most painfully distinct when photographed. The puff-box must be called in to the assistance of art. Here let me intrude one word of general advice. Blue, as we have seen, is the most readily affected by the light, and yellow the least; if, therefore, you would keep your complexion clear and free from tan freckles while taking your delightful rambles at the sea-side, discard by all means the blue veil, and substitute a dark green or yellow one in its stead. Blue tulle offers no more obstruction to the actinic rays of the sun than white. Half a yard of yellow net, though perhaps not very becoming, will be found more efficacious and considerably cheaper than a quart of kalydor.

THE sorrows of parting are felt most deeply by the one who is left.

WHEN I MEAN TO MARRY.

WHEN do I mean to marry?—Well—
 'Tis idle to dispute with fate:
 But if you choose to hear me tell,
 Pray listen while I fix the date:

When daughters haste with eager feet,
 A mother's daily toil to share;
 Can make the puddings which they eat,
 And mend the stockings which they wear;

When maidens look upon a man
 As in himself what they would marry,
 And not as army soldiers seem
 A sutler or a commissary;

When gentle ladies who have got
 The offer of a lover's hand,
 Consent to share his "earthly lot,"
 And do not mean his lot of land;

When young mechanics are allowed
 To find and wed the farmers' girls
 Who don't expect to be endowed
 With rubies, diamonds and pearls;

When wives, in short, shall freely give
 Their hearts and hands to aid their spouses,
 And live as they were wont to live
 Within their sires' one-story houses;

Then, madam—if I'm not too old—
 Rejoiced to quit this lonely life,
 I'll brush my beaver, cease to scold,
 And look about me for a wife!

MISS M. E. BRADDON'S NEW NOVEL.

ONLY A CLOD.

By the author of "Aurora Floyd," "Three Times Dead," "Lady Audley's Secret," "The Doctor's Wife," "The Outcasts," etc.

CHAPTER XXII.

TAKING IT QUIETLY.

"IF you could know all, Harcourt, as you never can, you might excuse—you might forgive—"

Harcourt Lowther, very quick of apprehension always, especially so where his own interests were concerned, had taken careful note of these broken sentences uttered by Maude Hillary, and, rowing Londonwards in the summer darkness, pondered on them long and deliberately, only arousing himself now and then from his sombre reverie, in order to express his profound contempt for some amateur waterman who was just saved from a foul by the superior skill of the young officer.

What did it mean? That was the question which Mr. Lowther set himself to answer.

"It means something more than the caprice of a shallow-hearted jilt," he thought, as he rested on his oars and lighted his cigar. "How pale she grew at sight of me! That white, agonized look in her face was real despair. 'If I could know all!' she said. All what? 'There's mystery somewhere. Maude Hillary is the last woman in the world to throw over a poor lover for the sake of a rich one. The sentimental girl, who was ready to keep her engagement with me at the sacrifice of her father's fortune, would scarcely marry a clownish rustic for the sake of his thirty thousand a year. Besides, these heiresses, who have never known what it is to have a wish denied them, are the most romantic creatures in creation, and cherish sublimely absurd ideas upon the sordid dross question. No, I cannot think that Maude would be influenced by any mercenary considerations—and yet how else—?"

The villas and villages on the river banks flitted past him like phantom habitations in the dim light. The flat shores of Battersea; the dingy roofs and chimneys of crowded Chelsea and manufacturing Lambeth; the bridges and barges; the low-lying prison, lurking like some crouching beast upon the swampy ground, shifted by as the oars dipped in the quiet water, while Harcourt Lowther's light wherry sped homeward with the tide. But all the length of his water-journey he could find no satisfactory answer to that question about Maude Hillary; and when he relinquished his boat to its rightful owner at a certain landing-place in Westminster, he was still undecided as to the meaning of those broken phrases which had dropped from the lips of the merchant's daughter in the first moment of surprise and emotion.

"I daresay it is only the old story after all," he thought, as he walked towards the Strand, in the purlieus of which he had taken up his quarters. "Lionel Hillary, being as rich as Croesus, is determined that no poor man shall profit by his daughter's fortune. Water runs to the river, and Maude's dowry will go to swell that old Cornish miser's savings. It's only my usual luck. I am engaged to a beautiful woman with a hundred thousand or so for a fortune, and I find a victorious rival in the man who cleans my boots."

But Mr. Lowther had not settled the question even yet. Lying awake and feverishly restless in his lodging in Norfolk street, Miss Hillary's pale face was still before him, the sound of her imploring tones was perpetually in his ear.

"If I knew all, I might forgive, I might excuse!" There must have been some meaning in those words, some secret involved in them. Surely, if her father had forced this marriage upon her, after the manner of some tyrannical old parent in a stage-play—surely, if that had been the case, she would have candidly told me the truth; she would have pleaded the best excuse a woman can have. There must be some secret reason for this marriage, and I must be a consummate fool if I fail in getting to the bottom of the mystery."

Mr. Lowther breakfasted early the next morning, and dressed himself with his accustomed neatness before going out. He had no body servant now whom he could badger and worry when the world went ill with him; or that individual would most assuredly have paid the penalty of Miss Hillary's broken faith. Harcourt Lowther, the younger son, was too poor to keep or pay a valet. He had grown weary of waiting for promotion in the army, as he had sickened of hoping for advancement at the bar, and had sold his commission. The world was all before him now, as it had been seven years ago, when he had first looked about him for a profession. The world was all before him, and his one chance of fortune, the possibility of a marriage with Maude Hillary, seemed entirely lost to him. It was scarcely strange if his spirits sank before the dismal blankness of the prospect which he contemplated that morning, as he loitered over his breakfast of London eggs and lodging-house toast and coffee.

He went out at a little after twelve o'clock, hailed the first prowling Hansom he encountered in the Strand, and ordered the man to drive to a certain street in the City, sacred to the stockbroking and money-making interests. Here he alighted, dismissed the cab, turned into a narrow court, still more entirely sacred to the stockbroking, and entered a little office, where there was a desk, two or three horse-hair chairs, a great many bills hanging against the wall, all relating to the stockbroking interests, and a six-foot screen of wooden panelling, dividing the small outer office from a larger inner office.

Mr. Lowther walked straight to this screen, and, standing on tip-toe, looked over into the second office.

A gentleman with sandy whiskers, a light overcoat and a white hat, was standing at a desk, and jotting some pencil memoranda upon the margins of a file of documents, which he was turning over with a certain rapidity and precision of touch peculiar to a man of business.

"Can you spare a quarter of an hour of your valuable time from the calculation of last year's prices for the Fiji Island Grand Junction Stock in order to devote it to the claims of friendship?" asked Mr. Lowther.

The clerks smiled as they looked up from their desks; and the gentleman with the white hat dropped his pencil, and ran to a little wooden door in the partition, over which Harcourt Lowther's hat made itself visible.

"My dear Lowther," he exclaimed, presenting himself in the smaller office, and stretching out both his hands towards the intruder, "this is a surprise; I thought you were at the Antipodes."

"Yes, that's the way of the world," answered Mr. Lowther, rather peevishly; "a man is banished to some outlandish hole at the remotest end of the universe, ergo, he's never to return to the civilized half of the globe."

"But it seems only yesterday when—"

"And that's another cruel thing a man's friends say to him when he does turn up in the civilized hemisphere," interrupted Mr. Lowther. "'It seems only yesterday when you left us'; that is to say, life has been so pleasant and rapid for us, amidst all the gaieties and luxuries and successes of the most wonderful city in the world, that we are utterly unable to believe in the dreary months and years that you've had to drag out, poor devil, in your hole on the other side of the line. That's what a fellow's friends mean when they talk their confounded humbug about its only seeming yesterday."

Harcourt Lowther's City friend was not the most brilliant or original of men when you took him away from the stockbroking interests. He stared blankly during Mr. Lowther's discontented remarks upon the selfishness of mankind.

"Haw! that's good. Meant no offence by allusion to yesterday; only meant that I was jolly glad to see you, you know, and so on. But you see a fellow turning up in the City, when you've been given to understand that he's in Van Diemen's Land, is rather a surprise, you know. Can I do any thing for you? I'll tell you what, old fellow, I can put you up to a good thing in the Etruscan Loan—panic prices—nine per cent., and certain to turn up trumps in the long run."

"Do you suppose I've any money to invest, or that if I had money, I'm the sort of a man to sink the glorious principal for the sake of some miserable dribblings in the way of interest? No, my dear Wilderson, you can do me a good turn, but it's in quite another direction. Just step this way."

He had his hand upon the buttonhole of his friend's light overcoat, and led him to the door leading into the court. Here, safely out of the hearing of the clerks at work in the inner office, Mr. Lowther lowered his voice to a confidential tone.

"Wilderson," he said, "I think you know Lionel Hillary the Australian merchant?"

"Hillary and Co.?" exclaimed Mr. Wilderson, "I should flatter myself I did."

"I want you to tell me all about him—how he stands—how he has stood for some time past; in short all you know about him."

The stockbroker pulled his bay-colored whiskers thoughtfully, and shook his head.

"These sort of things are rather difficult to know," he said; "but a man may have his thoughts about 'em."

"And what are your thoughts? Hang it, man, speak out. You talked just now of being ready to serve me. You can serve me in this matter, if you choose."

Mr. Wilderson shrugged his shoulders, and again pulled his whiskers in a reflective mood.

"Dear boy," he said presently, "come out into the court."

Out in the court the stockbroker hitched his arm through that of Harcourt Lowther, and began to discourse upon Lionel Hillary, or Hillary & Co., as Mr. Wilderson preferred to designate him. He said a great deal in a low, confidential voice, and Harcourt Lowther's lower jaw fell a little as he listened. One thing was made clear to the ex-officer, and that was, that Lionel Hillary's affairs had been hinted at by the knowing ones as rather shaky; that there had been even whispers of that awful word "suspension;" but that somehow or other Hillary & Co. had contrived to right themselves; and that it was supposed by the aforesaid knowing ones that the Australian merchant had found a wealthy backer.

"There's fresh blood been let into his business, you may rely upon it, dear boy," said Mr. Wilderson. "I know that he was in Queer street last Christmas. Bills referred to drawer, and that sort of thing. The bankers were beginning to get shy of his paper. I held a little of it myself, and a denced deal of trouble I had to plant it."

This and much more to hear did Harcourt Lowther seriously incline. Then he asked Mr. Wilderson to dine with him at a certain noted establishment in the Strand, and left the court, very grave of aspect and slow of step.

"So my lovely Maude is not a millionaire's daughter, after all," he thought. "And my friend Hillary has been dipping his capacious paw into Francis Tredethlyn's purse. I ought to have known that half these reputed rich men are as rotten as a pear. So this is the explanation of my simple Maude's heroics. Poor little girl, she has been the pretty fly with which that accomplished angler, Mr. Hillary, has whipped the stream for his big gudgeon! Any little card I may have arranged to play for myself has been very neatly taken out of my hands, and I find my friend provided with a needy father-in-law and an extravagant wife. However, I daresay there's some small part left for me to play; and perhaps the best thing I can do is to take it quietly."

Harcourt Lowther's servant!

The man to whom Maude Hillary was now engaged had once been the valet of her discarded lover. This could scarcely be a pleasant thought to any young lady early imbued with all the ordinary prejudices of society. Miss Hillary was not a strong-minded woman; she could not console herself with a neat aphorism from Burns to the effect that "a man's a man for a' that;" and to her, Harcourt Lowther's revelation seemed cruelly humiliating. She heard of young women in her own position marrying grooms, or perhaps even footmen, for love, and she had shuddered at the very idea of their iniquity. But was it not quite as degrading to marry a valet for meanness as to elope with a groom for love?

"He blacked Harcourt's boots!" thought poor Maude; and it is impossible to describe the utter despair expressed in that brief sentence. She met her lover with a very pale face the next day, and, seating himself in his accustomed place by her embroidery frame, Francis Tredethlyn saw there was something wrong. Alas! poor Francis! he had already learned to watch every change upon that beautiful face; already, before the marriage vows had been spoken, all the miserable tortures of doubt had begun to prey upon his devoted heart. She had promised to marry him, but she had not promised to love him. He remembered that; she had given herself to him in payment of her father's debt; she had sacrificed herself in accordance with the loyal instincts of her noble nature. Francis, generous and loyal himself, could understand thus much better than it was understood by Lionel Hillary, for whose sake the sacrifice was made.

There were times when the young man reproached himself for his selfishness in accepting the supreme desire of his soul. Ought he not rather to have wrestled with himself and let this bright young creature go? But there were other times when Francis Tredethlyn suffered himself to be beguiled by delicious hopes. Had not true and honest love sometimes triumphed over circumstance? Might not the day come when Maude Hillary would be able to return his affection, to reward his patience?

"I can afford to be so patient," he thought, "for it will be such happiness to be her slave." To-day, watching her pale face in pensive contemplation, Francis puzzled himself vainly to guess what was amiss with his promised wife. It was not only that she was paler than usual—and the brightness of her color had faded very much of late—but to-day there was a shade of coldness in her manner which was quite new to her affianced husband, and which sent a chill to his heart, always ready to sink under some vague apprehension where Maude Hillary was concerned. We hold these supreme joys of life by so slender a thread, that half our delight in them is poisoned by the dread of their possible loss.

"Maude," he said by-and-by, after a few commonplace phrases, and after he had watched her for some minutes in silence: "I am sure there is something amiss with you to-day. You are ill—you—"

"Oh no, not ill. Only a little worried!"

"Worried—but about what?"

"I heard something about you last night, Mr. Tredethlyn," said she—it was the first time she had called him Mr. Tredethlyn since their engagement—"something which you never told me yourself. Mr. Lowther—a—friend of papa's, who has just come home from Van Diemen's Land, told me—that—that you had been—"

"His servant! Yes, it is quite true. I was a soldier, and I was obliged to obey orders. I was ordered to attend upon Ensign Lowther, and I did my best to serve him well. When I enlisted in her Majesty's service I had all sorts of foolish fancies about fighting and glory, but they all dwindled down to the usual routine. No fighting, no glory, no desperate attacks upon Indian fortress, no scaling walls to plant the British flag upon the enemies' ramparts; but any amount of drill and hard work, and a discontented fine gentleman to wait upon."

A flood of crimson rushed into Maude's face as Francis said this; but the young man's head was drooping over the embroidery frame, and he was trifling mechanically with the loose Berlin wool lying on Miss Hillary's canvas.

"I am afraid you think it a kind of degradation to you that I should have been a servant, Maude—" he said presently.

"You never told me—"

"No—I told you I had been a private in the 51st. The other business was only a part of my duty."

Maude was silent for some moments after this. She sat looking dreamily out of the window, while Francis still twisted the Berlin wools in his strong fingers. Maude was the first to speak.

"Was it Mr. Lowther you meant just now, when you spoke of a discontented fine gentleman?" she asked with some slight hesitation.

"Yes; I never served any other master. Ensign Lowther was horribly discontented. He was one of those men who can't take things easily; but I can understand a good deal of his peevish restlessness now. I can sympathize with him now, Maude."

His voice grew low and tender as he said this.

"Why?" asked Miss Hillary, rather coldly.

"He was in love, Maude—an unhappy attachment, as I understood, to some lady—an heiress, I think—whose money was a hindrance to a marriage to them."

From the beginning to the end of this conversation, Maude Hillary's thoughts had been employed in debating one question—should she, or should she not, tell her future husband that Harcourt Lowther was the man to whom she had been previously engaged? He knew of that broken engagement, but he did not know the name of her lover. Was it her duty to tell him? It would be very unpleasant to do so; but then duty is so often unpleasant. She was still silently debating this subject; the words which she should speak were forming themselves in her mind; when the drawing-room door was opened, and a servant announced Mr. Lowther. Maude's heart beat violently. Would there be a scene? Why had Harcourt Lowther come, when he knew—? But Mr. Lowther very speedily relieved her fears upon this subject. Nothing could be more delightful than his manner. He was cordial to his old servant, without attempting any airs of patronage. He could not have been more entirely at his ease with Maude, had he been the most indifferent of first cousins.

Mr. Lowther was only acting up to his determination to take things quietly. He had met Lionel Hillary in the City that morning, and had surprised the merchant by speaking of Maude's engagement to Francis Tredethlyn.

"But don't alarm yourself, my dear Hillary," he said, with a frank smile. "To say that I adored, and to adore your daughter, is only to admit a fact to which, I daresay, every male visitor at the Cedars would be happy to testify in a round-robin. Miss Hillary is made to be worshipped. I have only been one among a score of worshippers. If ever I hoped to overcome your very natural prejudice against my disgusting poverty, I have long ceased to hope it, so it was scarcely such a death-blow to me to discover what had happened during my exile. Will you let me renew my old relations with your household? Will you let me be one of the moths again? I know now that the candle will burn, and that its dangerous glare alone, and not its tender warmth, is reserved for me, so I shall have only myself to blame if I come away with a scorched wing."

Mr. Hillary's only reply to this rather sentimental speech was a hearty invitation to dinner.

"I can give you your favorite Rhudesseimer with the oysters. Chablis is a mistake, when you can get good hook. Sharp seven, remember; but you may go earlier if you care for erocket. I daresay you'll find Tredethlyn there."

"The poor fellow is very hard hit, I suppose?"

Mr. Hillary smiled, and shrugged his shoulders.

"I never saw such a devoted creature. Good day."

The merchant hurried off, and Harcourt Lowther walked slowly away, pondering as he went.

A devoted creature. Yes, and there has been new blood let into the commercial anatomy of Hillary & Co. I daresay that poor devil, Tredethlyn, has been bled to a hideous extent."

The dinner at the Cedars went off very pleasantly. What dinner could fail to go off tolerably well, enlivened by Harcourt Lowther, when that gentleman cared to exercise his genius for making conversation? There were other guests at the merchant's round table, and after dinner people showed an inclination to stroll out of the lamplit drawing-room on to the dusky lawn, and down to the terrace, drawn perhaps by the magnetic influence of the river, which will be looked at.

It happened somehow—I suppose Mr. Lowther himself managed it—that he and Maude were left behind the rest of the loiterers upon the twilight terrace. Ah! how vividly in the memory of both arose the picture of a time long ago, when they had stood there side by side, by the same river, in a twilight calm like this, with the same star glimmering faintly in a rose tinted western sky. In Maude's breast that memory awakened cruel pangs of shame and remorse. In Harcourt Lowther's breast there was a strangely mingled feeling of bitterness and regret—bitterness against the Destiny which had given him so few of life's brightest possessions; regret for the vanished time in which some natural earnestness, some touch of fresh and manly feeling, had yet lingered in his heart.

"Poor, simple, unworldly Maude," he thought, as he contemplated the girl's face, "what a penitent look she has! and yet if she knew—"

He smiled, and left the thought unfinished. Then, turning to Maude, he said, with a little touch of melancholy solemnity, worthy of Edgar Ravenswood himself, "Miss Hillary, let us be friends. If you can bury the past, so can I. We may yet strew sweet flowers of friendship on the grave of our dead love."

"And I really don't want to let Francis Tredethlyn slip through my fingers altogether," Mr. Lowther added mentally, as a sort of rider to that pretty little speech.

Maude looked at him with rather a puzzled expression.

"You are very generous," she faltered, embarrassed, and at a loss how to express herself, "but—don't you think it would be better for us—to—to say good-by to each other—forever. I—I—hope you will marry some one—worthy of you—some one who is less the slave of circumstances than I am. I want to do my duty to Mr. Tredethlyn—and I think it is a part of my duty to tell him of our broken engagement."

"My dear Miss Hillary, you would surely never do anything so foolish. Poor Francis is the best fellow in the world, but he is just the man to be ferociously jealous if he once got any foolish crotchet into his head. I have lived in the same house with him, remember, and must therefore know him better than you do. As for saying farewell forever, and all that kind of thing, your eternal parting reads remarkably well in a novel, but it isn't practicable between civilized people who belong to the same rank of society. Georgina bids Algernon an irrevocable adieu on Tuesday morning, and there is burning of letters and love-locks, and weeping and wailing in Brompton Creseent; and on Wednesday evening the same Algernon takes her down to dinner in Westbourne Terrace. We can bury the past in as deep a grave as you like, and lay the ghost of memory with any exorcism you please, but we can't pledge ourselves not to meet any day in the week in the houses of our common friends."

Maude was quite unable to argue with so specious a reasoner as Mr. Lowther. She did her best to defend her position, and urged the necessity of telling Francis Tredethlyn the whole truth. But Harcourt overruled her objections, and in the end obtained from her a promise that she would still remain silent as to the name of her discarded lover.

It will be seen that I have only one measure of excellence for persons. Do they support my paper? If not, I care not what their politics, morals or habits of personal cleanliness are—in my opinion they are Copperheads, losers, speculators, and as such I will proclaim them to the world.

BROTHER CRAWFORD'S SERMON.

[In the palmy days of the Republic, when they had ministers and grace at the South, a minister just appointed to a parish in those parts delivered the following as his initial sermon:]

HE began apologetically as follows: You don't see me to-day in the dress I allers wear; I come among you as a stranger, and I am now tricked out in my store clothes. I am not a proud man, but I thought it would be more becoming before strangers.

After this he raised a hymn, in which the congregation joined. He then began his sermon:

My dear brethren and sisters, first and foremost, I'm gwine to tell you the affecting partin' I had with my congregation at Bethel Chapel. After I had got through with my farewell sarmont, as I eame down outen the pulpit, the old gray-headed brethren and sisters who had listened to my voice twenty years, crowded around me, and with sobbing eyes and tearful voices, said—Farewell, Brother Crawford!

As I walked down the aisle, the young ladies, trieked out in their finery, brass jewelry, gew-gaws, jimeracks, paints and flouncees, looked up with their bright eyes, and pronounced with their rosy lips—Farewell, Brother Crawford!

The young men in their tight patent leather boots, high collars and dashy waistcoats—smelling of pomatum and cigar smoke—with shanghai coats and striped zebra pants—they, too, said—Farewell, Brother Crawford!

The little children—lambs in the fold—lifted up their tiny hands and small voices, and with one accord, said—Farewell, Brother Crawford!

The colored brethren now eame forward—(black sheep who had been admitted to the fold under my ministry,) with tears rolling down their sable cheeks—they, too, said—Farewell, Brother Crawford!

As I got on my horse and bade adieu to my congregation forever—I turned to take a last look at the church where I had preached more'n twenty years—and as I gazed at its dilapidated wall and moss-covered roof—it, too, seemed to say—Farewell, Brother Crawford!

As I rode down through the village, the people who poked their heads outen the winders, and the servants who leant on their brooms, all seemed to say—Farewell, Brother Crawford!

As I passed down along the highway, thro' the forest, the wind, as it sighed and whistled through the tree tops, playing on the leaves and branches the burden of salvation—it, too, seemed to say—Farewell, Brother Crawford!

Crossing a little creek that was gurgling and singing over its pebbly bed, as it rejoiced on its way to the great ocean, it, too, seemed to say—Farewell, Brother Crawford!

As I rode along down a hot, dusty lane, an old sow that was asleep in a fence corner, jumped out on a sudden, with a loud broo-too, broo-too—she, too, seemed to say—Farewell, Brother Crawford!

My horse, he got frightened and jumped from under me, and as he curled his tail over his back—kicked up his heels, and ran off—he, too, seemed to say—Farewell, Brother Crawford!

DIDN'T WORK.—The Hon. Grantley Berkley, who several years ago visited our western territories for the purpose of buffalo hunting, has just published in England two volumes of his Life and Recollections, in which he gives a picture of the very peculiar times in which the author was born and flourished. Among his sketches of royal life is a story of Lady Haggerstone's scheme to charm the Regent: "Her ladyship had at her residence a miniature farmyard and three pretty little Alderney cattle. When the prince and his friends had arrived, she came forward from a side wicket as a milkmaid, for the purpose of making a syllabub for the prince. She had a silver pail in one hand and an ornamental stool in the other. Lady Haggerstone tripped along, with ribbons from her dainty little milking hat that hung on one side of her graceful head, and the smallest little apron tied below her laced stomacher, till she came opposite his Royal Highness, to whom she dropped a really graceful courtesy. Then passing lightly over the beautiful plaited straw, her tucked up gown showing her neat ankle as well as her colored stockings, she placed her pail and stool conveniently for use. Leaning against the flank of one of the crossiest looking Alderneys, she was attempting to commence her rustic labors, but not having selected the right sex, the offended animal did not seem to fancy the performance, for he first kicked out and then trotted away, nearly upsetting stool, pail and Lady Haggerstone, who covered with confusion, made a hasty retreat back to her little dairy, whence she did not appear again."

DR. FRANKLIN'S celebrated recipe for cheap sleigh-riding runs as follows: "Sit in the hall in your night-clothes, with both doors open so that you get a good draft—your feet in a pail of ice water—drop the front door key down your back—hold an icicle in one hand and ring the tea-bell with the other. He says you can't tell the difference with your eyes shut, and it is a great deal cheaper."

BRUTALITY AT SEA.

THE United States District Court has lately been occupied with the trial of the officers of the clipper ship Great Republic, upon the charge of ill treatment of sailors at sea. In their reports of the proceedings the daily papers state that details of some of the usage to which the sailors were subjected is too revolting for publication. Our minds are thus left free to conjure up all manner of horrors and enormities, since, as is well known, our enterprising journals are not very nice, so far as æsthetics are concerned, and it is a legitimate inference that what they fear to publish must be very bad indeed. It is a pity that the public have been left in suspense as to precisely what was done, for our community is an excitable one and might take it into its erratic head to lynch the culprits if the sentence pronounced by the Judge should seem not commensurate with the enormity of the offence. Two of the mates have been convicted; one of "beating and wounding a sailor," another of "cruel and unusual punishment." In these findings of the jury there is certainly nothing to indicate that humanity has been outraged and that the law has become that swift and terrible avenger which it is popularly supposed to be. Perhaps the Judge, in the sentences which it will be his pleasure to pronounce, will let a little light in upon what at present seems a very dark and contradictory mystery.

Certain rights exist between man and man, which the accidental relation of master and servant cannot abrogate, and it seems to us perfectly immaterial whether this relation exist at sea or on shore. The merchant is not accustomed to knock down his porters on the slightest provocation, and cases are rare in which the irate housekeeper assumes the privilege of beating her servant over the head with a rolling-pin because the bread is heavy or the dishes are not properly washed. In the one case, if the merchant assaulted his porter with a dray-pin, the latter would be considered justifiable in defending himself with a crow-bar, and in the other case the abused Bridget might go back at her mistress with a frying-pan or a fire-shovel, strong in the right of self-protection. And where is the difference between dray-pins and rolling-pins on shore and belaying-pins at sea? between the man who, standing at the helm long watches through, drives a ship over the deep for the merchant and he who wheels a truck for him on the floors of his store? In other words, if master or mate approach a sailor at sea with a belaying-pin or marlinspike raised to crack his skull, or crush his spine, has not the sailor the same right to defend his life and limbs that he would have were he employed on shore at equally lame wages, and similarly attacked by his master? It would certainly seem so, since in the latter instance it would be possible for him to get out of the way, while in the former, pinned down to the narrow limits of a ship's deck, he would have to stand and take it—or make a fight. If any man on shore should offer to one in his employ indignities the particulars of which would be "too revolting for publication" in the not over scrupulous columns of a San Francisco newspaper, public sentiment if not the law would hold the one so outraged guiltless if he avenged his insulted manhood by the death of his persecutor. Or, if he were defenceless and weak, the populace would arise and make the case their own, working for him that justice and retribution which his unaided arm was powerless to effect. And how does it change or modify in one particular the right to every one of self-protection and the vindication of his manhood that these nameless outrages have been perpetrated at sea?

Occasionally a sailor is brought into port in irons, charged with the murder of one of his officers. Looking to the treatment to which seamen are subjected, and at the inner side of marine rule and economy as revealed in the light of such cases as this of the Great Republic, the only wonder is that the majority of quarter-decks are not swept clean of their occupants and that "mutiny" is not a thing of more common occurrence. It may be laid down and accepted as a general proposition that good officers make good men, and that the cabin is as much at fault as the fore-castle where insubordination occurs. One thing is certain, sailors are murdered and sacrificed by hecatombs, and the whole ocean floor is white with their accusing bones. All orders given to the sailors he must obey at the peril of his life, and the officer of the deck has it in his power to shake a man or a dozen men who have provoked his spite from a yard by a pull too much or a pull too little upon a brace, and no one could accuse him of the accident.

Sailors are proverbially careless and notoriously prodigal and poor. Once ashore they forget all the wrongs and injuries they have suffered on ship-board, and they seldom have money to employ counsel, even were they inclined to seek legal redress. Their service at sea is hard, and their wages are lower than those of any other class of laborers. All these facts should be taken into account and the law should lend them its protection with a lavish hand. In the case of the Great Republic we trust that the Judge will teach masters and mates a wholesome lesson for all time to come, and make his sentence severe enough to cover the infliction of indignities upon a comparatively helpless crew, "too revolting for publication." Since writing the above, Judge Hoffman has charged the jury in the case, and not at all in favor of the officers, who, if indications may be relied upon, will have a pretty hard road to travel before the thing is ended.

IN A NUTSHELL.

CARLYLE once favored the world with what he called Ilias Americana in Nuce, and in manner somewhat like we wish that some one would give us the O'Byrne Iliad in a nutshell. For we question whether so great a cry has been made over so little wool since the expedition which went to "acquire"—the term is a modern one—the Golden Fleece, or whether so great a farce as the present Court of Inquiry was ever inaugurated since first interrogation points were invented. Our sprightly cotemporary, the Morning Call, after having before occupied the position of the woman who, when her husband had a set-to with the bear, didn't "care which whipped," on Thursday morning rushed to the rescue of this representative man, declaring that nothing had been proven against him beyond the fact that he owed his wash-woman and was less prompt at paying than at borrowing. Certainly, if having more creditors than resources or greater liabilities than assets were a crime, punishable by fine or imprisonment, very few in this community would now be walking at large; but we apprehend that the Call mistakes the issue. Obtaining goods on false pretences is a different thing from buying them upon time, and in one instance, if the evidence as published in the Call may be relied upon, this has been proven upon Mr. O'Byrne. Then there is a dinner which seems involved in mystery: gotten up by Mr. O'Byrne for the honor of an editorial associate, attended principally by newspaper men, who claim that they paid to Mr. O'Byrne their proportion of its cost, but that he did not pay a cent over to the hotel keeper who furnished it, it is little wonder that newspaper men have scarcely been Mr. O'Byrne's friend throughout his trials, as such an action was calculated to bring them into bad repute and complicate their relations with the world at large to an indefinite extent. Aside from the embezzlement and all that, it would naturally make boarding-houses and hotels look upon the fourth estate with suspicion, exacting payment of bills in advance, or at least requiring a deposit to ensure the safety of the spoons upon the table. Even the fact that Mr. O'Byrne paid a small portion of the account, after he received his appointment and the fact was arrayed against him, would scarcely mend the matter more than the restitution of an egg or two after a hue and cry had been raised would clear the skirts of a man accused of robbing a hen-roost, especially if that man were a candidate for a Justice of Peace when the tardy restitution was made. On the contrary, it would fix his culpability rather than otherwise. This idea may be regarded as a branching off from the original intent of the present article, as we purposed to present the Iliad in a nutshell—not in an egg-shell. Anyway the funeral is none of ours, nor is the general public called upon to join in the procession. The Court of Inquiry is principally concerned, and if the military gentlemen composing it think that Mr. O'Byrne will be an acquisition to the service and a supporter of the honor of the uniform, guiding their judgment by his antecedents, neither the public nor the press is called upon to assume the role of prosecutor. The Court can arrive at facts if it chooses to sift witnesses, and with it rests all the responsibility.

PENNY WISE, POUND FOOLISH.—The Alta tells us of a number of persons who have practiced reduction according to Banting's system and managed to lose from two to ten pounds in ten days. An English gentleman who came down from Victoria on the last steamer tells us that by a system of bucking the other night he managed to lose a hundred pounds in one hour.

JURIES AND JOURNALS.

CONSIDERABLE discussion has been going on, of late, relative to the right of public journals to comment upon evidence and express opinions as to the guilt or innocence of prisoners while trials are pending, the negative of the question being mainly taken by lawyers, who seem apprehensive that they will be robbed of their vocation and their fees if the practice be permitted. Much, too, is said about the influence upon jurors' minds of what are called ex parte statements, and the advisability of keeping the public in ignorance of all facts and evidence concerning crimes until those accused as the perpetrators have had trial.

There is much to be said on both sides. In the first place, an intelligent reporter has quite as much right to express his opinion about the guilt or innocence of a suspected party as any other man. If a murder occur he is generally among the first upon the ground; he gathers up every detail and from the very nature of his vocation is carefully observant of points which escape other eyes. He is or should be accustomed to digest facts and sift conflicting stories, and if the evidence which he collects and publishes points strongly towards the guilt or the innocence of the accused, has he not as much right to accompany it by an expression of opinion as has the man who looks in at the Coroner's office and utters his comments about town with only a blundering and confused idea of what he is saying? In either case it is but the expression of one man's opinion, the difference being that the reporter accompanies his conjectures with the facts upon which he builds them, leaving the reader free to follow his own convictions. In the matter of Byrnes, charged with the murder of Hill, in whose regard the comments of the press have furnished occasion for several lectures, every detail and thread of evidence seemingly fastened the crime upon him, and in speaking of him as "the murderer" reporters only used the expression which would naturally occur to every one familiar with the chain of testimony. So far as competency to pronounce an opinion is concerned, we question whether any juryman, bewildered by the pleadings of lawyers and the nervousness and confusion of witnesses, can judge of the guilt or innocence of a prisoner any more clearly than can the man who writes down the evidence dispassionately for publication in the first instance, gathering it from the fountain heads and weighing it with the judgment of one accustomed to cool criticism. And we apprehend that so far as jurymen are concerned, the majority could judge better of a case after reading intelligent comments upon it than when suddenly brought face to face in a noisy Court with brow-beating lawyers, frightened witnesses, and technicalities of law which they cannot comprehend.

So far from objecting to a man as a juror because he reads the papers, he should beyond question be challenged if he confess that he does not. For following the former rule ends in filling our jury-boxes with men too ignorant to form intelligent opinions upon anything, so that the trial resolves itself down into a mere pulling of straws for the prisoner's life or liberty, or a question of which of the jurymen can hold out longest and most obstinately when a division occurs and opposite verdicts are insisted upon. To take and read the papers by no means disqualifies a man for jury duty.

SPRING IN VIRGINIA.—According to all accounts, a spring over the mountains can scarcely be called a living spring. This is what the local columns of the Virginia Enterprise tell us of the weather: "Lately we have had quite a number of warm days. It is supposed by many that spring has come at last. It was rumored yesterday that a blade of grass had been seen on Six-mile Canon. As the discoverer did not bring it to the city, we cannot vouch for the correctness of the story: however, it was pretty generally credited at the hay-yard, and during the afternoon Sierra Valley hay fell a cent. It was also said that a quartz teanster who travels to and fro between this place and Washoe Valley was seen with a violet stuck in the button-hole of his vest. This story deserves but little credit, as on tracing it back it was found that the flower was seen by none but two or three restaurant keepers, who naturally would wish to make it appear that Washoe vegetables will soon be in market; besides, they do not very well agree about the matter—one insists that the flower was no violet, but a wild onion blossom. On the whole we are inclined to think where there are so many rumors there must be some foundation for them; and, provided we have no more cold weather, the chances are we will have an early spring."

STRUCK PETROLEUM.—The Bulletin has a deal to say lately about petroleum, and if indications may be discovered we do believe that our evening cotemporary has struck it rich. For a worse smelling compound than the printing-ink which it has been using of late was never invented or discovered, and if it is not kerosene we are at a loss to know what it can be. Hands, handkerchiefs—everything it comes in contact with is made to stink abominably, rendering a process of deodorizing an immediate necessity. The Bulletin should have better scents.

DESPERATE FIGHTING.

THE Virginia Enterprise and Virginia Union are engaged in a small war of words over the military genius and skill displayed by a Nevada captain of volunteers surnamed Wells, who lately marched twenty-nine of his men upon an Indian encampment and wrought its destruction, scarcely sparing a single pappoose. The Union claims it to have been a massacre, while the Enterprise contends that it was a gallant deed and that "too much praise cannot be awarded to the gallant officer," etc.

The Gold Hill News, standing aloof from all excitement, and viewing the affair abstractly, copies Capt. Wells' report and comments upon it in a spicy article, from which we have room for only a brief extract, as follows:

"The next morning, the 14th inst., at 3 o'clock, I left the camp with twenty-nine of my men, and two citizens Messrs. T. W. Murch and W. H. Wilson, who volunteered their services as guides, for the purpose of arresting the guilty Indians. We came in sight of their encampment about half-past 5 o'clock A. M. I divided my command into three squads, under Sergts. Wadleigh and Besat, ten men remaining with me. I then approached their encampment, intending to arrest them, but when within about one hundred and fifty yards, they commenced firing upon me. The first shot took effect in Corporal Dolan's shoulder, wounding him slightly; the second passed through the cape of my overcoat. I then ordered a charge with sabres. The Indians fell back to the bushes on both sides of the slough. By this time the men under Sergeants Wadleigh and Besat came up, and a general engagement ensued. The Indians fought like veterans. I killed twenty-nine in all; but one escaped. I destroyed several guns, a quantity of powder, fresh beef, etc. I pursued and fought them for about two miles up into the mountains. Some of my men had hand to hand conflicts with them; several were beaten on the arms with the Indians' guns. I also captured nine horses, but as they were very poor I did not deem it necessary to bring them in. Throughout the battle my men behaved with a valor and fortitude rarely equalled. Without exception, they were as cool and collected as though on an ordinary skirmish drill."

This story, being still further boiled down, amounts to just this: Capt. Wells, with his twenty-nine men, killed exactly twenty-nine Indians, not one of the bold cavaliers having received a scratch (except Corporal Dolan, who for thus marring the symmetry of the story, should be drummed out of the service.) The number of Indians killed was extremely judicious, allowing as it did precisely one Indian for breakfast to each of the dragoons; not counting the Captain, who, of course, messes by himself. The Captain says: "I killed twenty-nine Indians in all;" but this is figurative, meaning, of course, that his men killed that number of Indians; just as Marcus Antonius says of Caesar: "That day he overcame the Nervii." The glory of the victory is further enhanced by the announcement that "the Indians fought like veterans." The result would seem to establish the fact that they had fought about like surviving "veterans" of the revolutionary war, and with guns plowed up from the battle-ground of Bunker Hill. Veterans blind and palsied with age, and armed with Queen Anne's muskets, destitute of lock, stock or barrel, would have been about as formidable as these twenty-nine Piutes seem to have been. The dragoons "behaved with a valor and fortitude rarely equalled!" The Captain has undoubtedly read of the terrible charges through the fiery hells of Fredericksburg and Lookout Mountain, even though he was not there to see. Those affairs were trifling, probably, compared with the terrific rampage of the twenty-nine men. His men were "cool and collected"—a fact which malicious traducers might attribute equally to the chilliness of the atmosphere and the total absence of the slightest danger. Well; the glorious twenty-nine have achieved glory enough for a lifetime. Their brows are bound with victorious wreaths; their bruised arms hung up for monuments, and they caper nimbly in the lager beer cellar to the lascivious pleasing of the hurdy-gurdy."

Satirical, however, as the Gold Hill News evidently is inclined to be, we look upon the Enterprise's serious comments as more amusing still, for beyond characterizing the affair as "one of the most desperate fights ever witnessed" we do not think that burlesque could further go. According to Capt. Wells' report, two shots were fired by the Indians, and he had leisure to count them and trace the course of the balls. Some of his men had hand-to-hand conflicts with the enemy, and several of them were beaten upon the arms with the Indians' guns. It must have been desperate, indeed, and what reckless and abandoned devils those same Piutes must be, beating their opponents over the arms in the fierce heat and clash of battle with clubbed guns! We look anxiously along in the gallant captain's report to find that several of his men had their toes trodden upon by the Indians in this sanguinary "hand-to-hand" conflict which resulted in a loss of twenty-nine men to the blood-thirsty and aggressive Piutes, and only a corporal shot in the neck on the side of the Nevada volunteers. If a corporal were to be shot anywhere, we imagine he would choose to be shot in the neck, for it is a species of self-target practice in which corporals are very apt to indulge, as all army annals abundantly testify. Capt. Wells says he captured a "number of guns," but does not inform us whether they are Parrots or Paixhans, though we infer that they are the former, as the Piutes are notoriously well supplied with field-ordnance. We trust that Capt. Wells will some day have an opportunity of making a report on a large scale, for it is not often we find a hero endowed with such eminent qualifications for being his own historian.

DRAMATIC MENTION.

WHEATLEIGH has held possession of the Opera House during the week, and excellent audiences have been the rule. On Monday evening the nose-reddening drama of The Octoroon formed the attraction, and the consequence was a scarcity of cambric handkerchiefs in town and an increased demand for the pamphlet which antedated Banting's as the popular excitement. We never see this triumph of Boucicault's without thinking of Artemus Ward and his: "How long have you been an Octoroon, my dear?" Tuesday evening, Grimaldi, or The Life of an Actress, filled the bills. This play gives Wheatleigh an opportunity for the delineation of one of those absurd French characters in which he is so invariably excellent, Mrs. Edwin having an opportunity to exhibit her most popular qualities as "Violet"—the débutante. One scene in Grimaldi, or one act rather, is either borrowed from Miss Heron's Mothilde, or else one of the most exciting passages of the latter play is built upon Grimaldi, for we have the scene at the lone chateau, the unprotected female carried there by fraud, the carriage of her friends thrown down a precipice, the plausible well-dressed villain, the cup of drugged-tea, the "now you are mine and mine only," the sudden irruption of friends, the rescue of the unprotected female, and the shot in the back, which her lover gets from the villain through a window—all as like as two peas. Wednesday we had The Victims and The Toddlekins, and last evening the benefit of Mr. and Mrs. Hill was announced, Everybody's Friend—Wheatleigh as "Major Wellington de Boots"—a musical interlude, and Nani, the Good for Nothing, constituting the entertainment. The benefit is the first one these artists have had at the Opera House, and they certainly deserve a good one, for both are painstaking and deserving, and Mr. Hill, in particular, has rapidly developed the qualities of a very good actor in light comedy, besides being a most acceptable vocalist. This afternoon Our American Cousin will be performed, and in the evening The Colleen Bawn will give her favorite swimming lessons to the multitude. For Tuesday evening of next week Mrs. Grantly's début in The Wife, is announced.

Mr. John Torrence's benefit at the Metropolitan on Thursday evening was one of those substantial acknowledgments which popular favorites receive when their friends take it into their heads to do something for them. The house was full, and we are told that more tickets were sold than it could have held had its walls been composed of India rubber instead of brick and mortar. We imagine that of the popular esteem, as manifested in this testimonial, a very good share fell to the lot of the beneficiary's wife, Mrs. Judah, one of the best actresses that ever stepped foot upon the Pacific stage, as well as one of the pleasantest and most charming ladies that can be found in a day's travel. The Love Knot was presented—not the "Love not, ye hapless sons of clay," of the Hon. Mrs. Norton's—but a very excellent comedy of that name; and a song and dance by the popular and pretty pet, Jenny Worrell; a jig by O'Neil, a solo on the pianoforte by Evans, and the afterpiece of The Model of a Wife, in which Mr. Wheatleigh appeared as "Pygmalion Bonnefoi"—one of his best characters. As reporters are accustomed to say, "Nothing occurred to mar the happiness of the occasion."

The Eureka minstrels have had an addition to their company, Miss Clara Day has dawned, Fred Sprung has sprung into a local habitation if not a name upon the boards as primo basso, J. E. Taylor cuts out one of the former "end men" and George Winship spreads his sails. We question whether the new "prima donna" is destined to attain eminence either as a Day or an evening "star" until she shall have availed herself of those advantages which care and cultivation alone afford. Sprung has a light pleasant voice and is solicitous to please. As to the end men, old and new, Birch and Backus have spoilt us for any others.

Miss Heron closed her engagement in Sacramento last Saturday evening. The papers of that city speak of it "as one of the most brilliant ever played" there, and express the unanimous wish of the people that she "again favor Sacramento with her presence before leaving the State." Miss Heron opened in Virginia City at Maguire's Opera House on Tuesday evening, to an audience which the Union characterizes as "one of the largest and most brilliant audiences ever assembled within those walls," the piece being Hester Prynne. The Union goes on to say that the audience, "though crowded to suffocation, listened with the most breathless attention, expressing their gratification with frequent bursts of applause." On Tuesday morning over two hundred seats were engaged for Wednesday evening, and a large number were secured for Thursday evening, so that the Heron's success in Silver land may be set down as un fait accompli. We are glad she has no cause to regret her flight over the mountains.

ALL who appreciate high-art and the ethics of the bar, will regret to learn that "Tom"—one of the most expert gentlemen in his profession that ever existed and a man about whom there is nothing mixed notwithstanding his "mixing" proclivities—is to leave the Occidental for the East in one of the April steamers. In the whole course of his administration we have yet to learn that Tom has made an enemy, and it is certain that he has found many friends who will regret his going.

PROFITABLE PAPERS.—The Sacramento Bee has been making an estimate of the profits which our daily newspapers pay to their proprietors, taking the receipts from advertising as shown upon the Assessor's books, as the basis of its calculations. Furthermore, it animadverts rather severely upon the small amounts which the proprietors return to the Assessor as their actual incomes for the year, not knowing, apparently, that it has been decided that in paying a tax upon their advertising receipts newspaper proprietors in fact pay a tax upon their incomes, which should very properly let them out from being again called upon. The Bee ciphers out the following result: "These papers make returns to the Assessor under oath, of the amount of money received by them for advertisements, and in round numbers, the figures as given by a correspondent, are as follows: Alta, $192,000 per annum; Bulletin, $170,000; Call, $112,000. The total expenses of the Alta (we estimate from our knowledge of the expense of newspaper publishing,) are about $3,000 per week, or $156,000 per annum; the Bulletin's expenses are about the same; the Call's about $1,300 per week, or $57,600 per annum. From this it will be seen that the total receipts, per annum, of each paper for advertisements alone, over and above all expenses are: Alta, $36,000; Bulletin, $14,000; Call, $54,400. In addition, which is all net gain, the Alta receives subscriptions of at least 25 cents a week on 3,000 copies, which amount to $39,000 per annum. The Bulletin receives 20 cents a week per copy for 5,000 copies—making $2,000 per annum. The Call receives five cents per copy a week on 8,000 copies—making $20,800 per annum. Add their receipts for subscriptions (all net profit) to the net profit for advertising, and we find the profits or incomes of each of the papers to be as follows: Alta, $75,000 per annum; Bulletin, $66,000; Call, $65,200. Total incomes of the three papers, $206,200. The three papers named have in all ten proprietors: Alta, two; Bulletin, four; Call, four. If their receipts for advertising as returned to the Assessor, are correct, the aggregate of their incomes is in round numbers $206,000—or 20,600 each.

IS THIS LEGITIMATE.—Religious papers are popularly supposed to have a character of their own—we would say an independent character were we not apprehensive that the expression might be interpreted into an unpaid-for puff of that very excellent religious journal—notwithstanding its worldly stripe—the New York Independent. This wide-awake journal has always cultivated the advertising interest assiduously, but we are not aware that it ever has as yet admitted "star" notices—if we except the contributions of Henry Ward Beecher, whose signature is a "*"—into its editorial columns. But the Pacific, of this city, is pursuing a different course, to which we take decided exception as an infringement of the patent of non-professing papers. Thus, among its religious items, a notice of a tooth powder is intruded, leading the many persons who are ignorant of the signification of a "*" at the end of a paragraph to believe that it is an editorial endorsement of some "Sozodont," upon the use of which salvation hinges. In one paragraph the necessity of escaping damnation is pressed upon the sinner, and in the next he is urged to seek a certain dentifrice. Again: the Alta, a short time since, published several columns of sceptical twaddle over the suggestive signature of "Sniktaw." It was the common bar-room philosophy of atheism which few would have cared to read, but the Pacific of the same week at the bottom of its editorial columns, advertises it as follows: "For buckets of impious swash, see yesterday's Alta." We submit that all this is not at all in keeping with "the eternal fitness of things."

TO FIND THE VALUE OF GREENBACKS.—As yet we have not seen any simple rule published by which the relative value of greenbacks compared with the ruling price of gold may be ascertained without difficulty. It is simply necessary to divide 10,000 by the price of gold and the quotient will give the value of greenbacks to the smallest fraction. The rule upon which this process is based is one of the simplest known in arithmetic—the Rule of Three. Thus: suppose gold to be 200, the proposition would be stated as follows: 200 : 100 :: 100. Dividing the product of the second and third terms by the first, we have 50 as the quotient, which is the fourth term sought. The second and third term being always the same, it is only necessary to divide their product (10,000) by the price of gold which stands as the first term, and we know what greenbacks are worth to a dot.

WHAT IS IN NAMES.—The steamers that sailed March 13th ago, carried some queer names away from these parts. In the list of passengers we find Birch, Bush, Greenleaf, Acorn, Woodside, Post, and Boardman, all of whom might very properly have come from Forest City. Then the provisional passengers, Bacon, Lamb, Hogg, Bone. Colors that run, such as Green and White. It may be said that the Stroug, Young, and Swell are going hence; Paradise, Ranch, and Camp are changing their locations; Hoop is rolling away; Cash and Stock, the latter ominously accompanied by Robb, are seeking an Eastern market. Coates and Seams will have to suit themselves to the sea, and we might chase the list up further, but space fails.

WHO CARES?

WHO cares for the last year's rose?
Or the flowers of last year's May?
Or the leaf dried sweet in a mouldy book?
Or the love who is away?

Who cares for the cloud gone by?
Or last week's rain and wind?
Or a golden crescent of folded curl
The dead one left behind?

A tress of hair and a faded leaf
Are paltry things to a cynic's eyes,
But to me they are keys that open the gates
Of a paradise of memories.

A TERRIBLE REVENGE.

OF our pleasant party at the Elms last Christmas, Kate O'Hara was the beauty, far away. I remember our little silence of admiration as she came into the drawing-room just before dinner was announced (for your prima donna does not care to enter until the house is full) and the great sensation her arrival made, though she could not have approached more quietly or meekly if she had been the cat. Half a dozen young ladies who, before her advent, looked pretty enough, suddenly became quite uninteresting to a corresponding number of bachelors, and even we married gentlemen paused a while in our talk of short-horns to steal an admiring glance. We had resumed our bovine conversation, and were diverging, if I remember aright, in the direction of the Prince Consort's pigs, when my wife came up to me, and whispered:

"That's little Kate O'Hara!"

Why did my cheek glow and my heart throb? Why did the name of one whom I had not seen since she was a little child recall at once the crowning happiness and chief confusion of my life?

It shall be told, terribly, anon.

The six bachelors "entered themselves" immediately for "the O'Hara stakes," as one of them was subsequently pleased to designate the dreaming of Love's young dream; and two of them—a middy and an under-graduate—got the start, and made the running at the most reckless pace I ever saw. Indeed, the sailor proposed on the third evening, and was declined with such good-natured cheerfulness that he seemed to be rather pleased than otherwise; whereas the collegian, who was of a poetical turn, took his refusal, the day following, very seriously to heart, and passed the remaining part of his visit in sorrow and the shrubberies. Two other competitors, unattached, (except to Kate,) were disposed of at an archery ball; and the race then lay between Charley Northcote, captain of hussars, and Philip Lee, curate.

It was a grand set-to—"hands up," I can tell you. If Charley had the handsomest face, and—playing with a bullet pendent from his watch chain, but which had previously resided in his leg—could talk of the time "when I was in the Crimea." Philip had the more intellectual expression, and had won at Oxford the under-graduate's "blue ribbon"—the Newdegate prize for English verse. Charley, it is true, when we were skating on the lake, produced upon the ice such wondrous "eagles" as Audubon never dreamed of; but he was, on the other hand, the first to own, when the frost broke up, that, "in a really good thing with hounds, there was not one of them could catch the parson." For Philip, though he did not hunt in his own parish, could "go like a bird" out of it, whenever he could get a mount.

On the night before our party separated we had a grand performance of charades, and in the last of these the Reverend Mr. Lee had won immense applause as a ferocious captain of banditti, acting with the greatest enthusiasm, and having composed for himself, with the co-operation of a cork, a pair of mustaches which rivaled Charley's. We were to appear at supper in our charade costumes, and were waiting the announcement of that refection, when I noticed an extraordinary phenomenon, which caused me instantly and earnestly to whisper to Miss O'Hara, "I have something to say to you. Come at once."

We passed unnoticed from the crowded drawing-room into the library, still littered with our theatrical properties. Seizing a dagger, and assuming a characteristic scowl (I was attired as a brigand's assistant,) I bade her "Listen!" And she (I see her now in her pretty hat and cloak, for she had represented in our last scene the young English countess stopped by the robbers,) ever ready for burlesque and mirth—as she supposed all this to be—made answer, solemnly,

"Say on!"

"Twelve years ago, Catherine O'Hara, I wooed and won in the home of your childhood the lady who is now my wife. On a sweet summer's eve I told my love, sitting under an acacia, and upon a garden-seat the property of your respected sire. Hard by, you, then a little child, were swinging in a swing. Those same long silken Irish lashes drooped over those deep-blue eyes, and we never dreamed that you took note of us, sealing, in the usual manner, our vows of mutual love. Judge, then, how intense our agony, how complete and awful our abasement, when, as we rejoined the festive throng for coffee, you cried aloud for all to hear:

"Oh, mamma! those two did so kiss each other, when I was swinging in the elm!"

"For twelve years, Kate O'Hara, the memory of that humiliation has troubled my indignant soul; but, at last, I am avenged—look here!"

I held before her one of the hand looking-glasses which lay on the table near, and she was preparing to say something in the dramatic style, as she snatched it from me with the proud air of a tragedy queen, when her eye caught the reflection of her face, and in a moment that fair countenance was blanched and pale, and she stood, with her head drooping, speechless. For upon her lip, reader, she saw, as I had seen, the certain sign and trace that, in some obscure corner behind the scenes, the race had been decided for the "O'Hara Stakes," and that the Brigand Lee had won. He had left half his cork mustache on that lovely lip.

"Kate," I said, "you cannot be vexed with me, for I congratulate you with all my heart. May you be as happy, dear girl, with our friend the robber, as 'those two' have been happy, whom you saw 'so kissing one another,' from beneath those silken lashes as you sat swinging in the elm!"

A CASE OF CIRCUMSTANTIAL EVIDENCE.

IN the year 1742, a case of a very remarkable nature occurred near Hull. A gentleman travelling to that place was stopped late in the evening, about seven miles from the town, by a single highwayman, with a mask on his face, who robbed the traveller of a purse containing twenty guineas. The highwayman rode off by a different path, full speed, and the gentleman, frightened, but not injured except in purse, pursued his journey. It was growing late, however, and being naturally much agitated by what had passed, he rode only two miles farther, and stopt at the Bell Inn, kept by Mr. James Brunnell. He went into the kitchen to give directions for his supper, where he related, to several persons present, the fact of his having been robbed; to which he added this peculiar circumstance, that when he travelled he always gave his gold a peculiar mark, and that every guinea in the purse taken from him was thus marked. Hence he hoped the robber would yet be detected. Supper being ready, he retired. He had not long finished his supper, when Mr. Brunnell came into the parlor where he was, and after the usual inquiries of landlords as to the guest's satisfaction with his meal, observed, "Sir, I understand you have been robbed, not far hence, this evening." "I have, sir," was the reply. "And your money was marked?" continued the landlord. "It was," said the traveller. "A circumstance has arisen," resumed Mr. Brunnell, "which leads me to think that I can point out the robber. Pray, at what time in the evening were you stopped?" "It was just setting in to be dark," replied the traveller. "The time confirms my suspicions," said the landlord; and he then informed the gentleman that he had a waiter, one John Jennings, who had of late been so very full of money, and so very extravagant, that he (the landlord) had been surprised at it, and had determined to part with him, his conduct being every way suspicious; that long before dark that day, he had sent out Jennings to change a guinea for him; that the man had only come back since the arrival of the traveller, saying he could not get change and that, seeing Jennings to be in liquor, he had sent him off to bed, determining to discharge him in the morning. Mr. Brunnell continued to say, that when the guinea was brought back to him, it struck him that it was not the same which he had sent out for change, there being on the returned one a mark, which he was very sure was not upon the other; but that he should probably have thought no more of the matter, Jennings having frequently had gold in his pockets of late, had not the people in the kitchen told him what the traveller had related respecting the robbery, and the circumstance of the guineas being marked. He (Mr. Brunnell) had not been present when this relation was made, and unluckily before he heard of it from the people in the kitchen, he had paid away the guinea to a man who lived some distance, and who had now gone home. "The circumstance, however," said the landlord in conclusion, struck me so very strongly, that I could not refrain as an honest man, from coming and giving you information of it."

Mr. Brunnell was duly thanked for his candid disclosure. There appeared from it the strongest reason for suspecting Jennings; and if, on searching him, any others of the marked guineas should be found, and the gentleman could identify them, there would then remain no doubt in the matter. It was now agreed to go up to his room; Jennings was fast asleep; his pockets were searched, and from one of them was drawn forth a purse, containing exactly nineteen guineas. Suspicion now became certainty; for the gentleman declared the purse and guineas to be identically those of which he had been robbed. Assistance was called; Jennings was awakened, dragged out of bed, and charged with the robbery. He denied it firmly, but circumstances were too strong to gain him belief. He was secured that night, and next day taken before a justice of the peace. The gentleman and Mr. Bran-nell deposed to the facts upon oath, and Jennings, having no proofs, nothing but mere assertions of innocence which could not be credited, was committed to take his trial at the next assizes.

So strong seemed the case against him, that most of the man's friends advised him to plead guilty, and throw himself on the mercy of the court. This advice he rejected, and, when arraigned, plead not guilty. The prosecutor swore to the fact of the robbery; though as the thing took place in the dusk, and the highwayman was in a mask, he could not swear to the person of the prisoner, but thought him of the same stature nearly as the man who robbed him. To the purse and guineas, when they were produced in court, he swore—as to the purse, positively, and as to the marked guineas, to the best of his belief; and he testified to their having been taken from the pocket of the prisoner.

The prisoner's master, Mr. Brunnell, deposed as to the sending of Jennings for the change of a guinea, and to the waiter's having brought back to him a marked one, in the room of one he had given him unmarked. He also gave evidence as to the discovery of the purse and guineas on the prisoner. To consummate the proof, the man to whom Mr. Brunnell had paid the guinea, as mentioned, came forward and produced the coin, testifying at the same time that he had received it on the evening of the robbery from the prisoner's master, in payment of a debt; and the traveller, or prosecutor, on comparing it with the other nineteen, swore to its being, to the best of his belief, one of the twenty marked guineas taken from him by the highwayman, and of which the other nineteen were found on Jennings.

The judge summed up the evidence, pointing out all the concurring circumstances against the prisoner; and the jury, convinced by this strong accumulation of circumstantial evidence, without going out of court brought a verdict of guilty. Jennings was executed some little time afterwards at Hull, repeatedly declaring his innocence up till the very moment of his execution.

Within a twelvemonth afterwards, Brunnell, the master of Jennings, was himself taken up for a robbery committed on a guest in his house, and the fact being proved on trial, he was convicted, and ordered for execution. The approach of death brought on repentance, and repentance confession. Brunnell not only acknowledged himself to have been guilty of many highway robberies but owned himself to have committed the very one for which poor Jennings suffered.

The account which Brunnell gave was, that after robbing the traveller, he had got home before him by swift riding and by a nearer way. That he found a man at home waiting for him, to whom he owed a little bill, and to whom, not having enough of other money in his pocket, he gave away one of the twenty guineas which he had just obtained by the robbery. Presently came in the robbed gentleman, who, whilst Brunnell, not knowing of his arrival, was in the stable, told his tale, as before related, in the kitchen. The gentleman had scarcely left the kitchen before Brunnell entered it, and there, to his consternation, heard of the facts, and of the guineas being marked. The guinea which he had paid away he dared not ask back again; and as the affair of the robbery, as well as the circumstance of the marked guineas, would soon become publicly known, he saw nothing before him but detection, disgrace, and death. In this dilemma, the thought of accusing and sacrificing poor Jennings occurred to him. The state of intoxication in which Jennings was, gave him an opportunity of concealing the money in the waiter's pocket. The rest of the story the reader knows.

An innocent old lady, who never before had "rid on a railroad," was passenger on one of the Vermont railroads at the time of a recent collision, when a freight train collided with a passenger train, mashing one of the cars, killing several passengers, and upsetting things generally. As soon as he could recover his scattered senses, the conductor went in search of the venerable old dame, whom he found sitting solitary and alone in the car (the other passengers having sought terra firma) with a very placid expression upon her countenance, notwithstanding she had made a complete somersault over the seat in front, and her handbox and bundle had gone unceremoniously down the passage way. "Are you hurt?" inquired the conductor. "Hut! why?" said the old lady. "We have just been run into by a freight train; two or three passengers have been killed and several others severely injured." "La, me! I didn't know but that was the way you always stopped."

It is said that a Highland gentleman with his servant, a long time ago, while travelling through England, came to an inn, where there was only a single bed—covered of course with the inevitable tester. Neither had ever seen a bed; and the gentleman, accordingly laid himself down on the canopy, while his henchman crept in between the blankets. Towards morning the bare boards began to feel rather hard and cold, when the man of elevated position in society inquired of "John" how he did. "Vera weel, sir," replied John. "Ah!" rejoined the gentleman, "if it was na for the look o' the thing, I wad come down myself."

STOP THAT COUGHING!

SOME of you can't, and we pity you. You have tried every remedy but the ONE destined by its intrinsic merit, to supersede all similar preparations. It is not surprising you should be reluctant to try something else after the many experiments you have made of the trashy compounds foisted on the public as a certain cure; but

NEWELL'S PULMONARY SYRUP!

Is really the VERY BEST remedy ever compounded for the cure of Coughs, Colds, Sore Throat, Asthma, Whooping Cough, Bronchitis and Consumption. Thousands of people in California and Oregon have been already benefited by the surprising curative powers of

NEWELL'S PULMONARY SYRUP,

And with one accord give it their unqualified approbation. We now address ourselves to all who are unacquainted with this, the greatest Panacea of the age, for the healing of all diseases of the Throat and Lungs, assuring you that

NEWELL'S PULMONARY SYRUP

HAS CURED THOUSANDS!

And it will cure YOU if you try it.

This invaluable medicine is pleasant to the taste; soothing, healing and strengthening in its effects; entirely free from all poisons or deleterious drugs, and perfectly harmless under all circumstances.

HOSTETTER'S CELEBRATED

STOMACH BITTERS.

A TIMELY WARNING TO THE SICK.—It is especially important at this time, when the markets of the United States are flooded with the direct poisons, under the name of imported liquors, and when domestic compounds, purporting to be medicinal, but not a whit less pernicious, are heralded to the world as "sovereign remedies," that the public should fully understand the facts. Be it known, then, that while all the diffusive stimulants called liquors are impure, and all the Tonics containing alcohol are manufactured with a fiery article containing amyl or fusil oil, a mortal poison; HOSTETTER'S CELEBRATED STOMACH BITTERS contain none of these things, but are a combination of pure Essence of Rye with the pure juices of the most valuable stomachic, antibilious and aperient herbs and plants, and that as a safe and rapid remedy for Dyspepsia and all its kindred complaints, this preparation stands before the world without a rival or competitor. Its sales to-day are equal to the combined sales of all the other Tonics advertised in the United States, and the certificates which authenticate its usefulness are signed by individuals of the highest standing in every professional calling and walk of life. FARRAND'S OSCILLATING

Amalgamator.

THIS UNRIVALED IMPROVEMENT FOR THE REDUCTION AND AMALGAMATION OF Gold and Silver Ores, is now running daily at No. 206 Commercial street, between Front and Davis.

THIS AMALGAMATOR INVOLVES

NO COMPLICATED MACHINERY

And possesses the following advantages over all others now in use:

1st. It is capable of doing double the amount of work of the ordinary Pans, at a saving of more than one-half the power.

2d. It reduces the pulp finer, thereby producing a better result.

3d. It requires less quicksilver by one-half at a charge, whilst the loss by trituration is comparatively nothing.

4th. As an Amalgamator for gold contained in sulphurets, as also for very fine or flour gold, it has no equal.

5th. This Amalgamator involves no complicated machinery, and is less liable to get out of order than any of the pans.

DESCRIPTION OF FARRAND'S AMALGAMATOR.

In offering this Amalgamator to the public the inventor does not claim any new or scientific method of extracting the precious metals from the ores; he merely claims a new and simple combination of mechanical principles, whereby a great saving of power (full one-half in amount) is effected. The capacity of the machine varies with its size. The smallest, or prospecting size, will reduce 400 lbs. in three hours, and can be easily worked by the power of one man. The largest size will work 1,500 lbs in three hours, or six tons in 24 hours, with an application of a trifle more than one-horse power. This saving of power, as all mill-men are aware, is an important consideration particularly where fuel is scarce. The power so saved in running the Amalgamators may be advantageously employed to an increase of stamps, and thus proportionally increasing the work of the mill. This machine consists of a semi-cylindrical, trough-shaped vessel, in the interior of which is furnished with moveable concave discs, to be replaced when worn out, as in ordinary pans. The mullers are convex, and attached to a substantial rock shaft, by which they are moved back and forward by crank or eccentric motion. The mullers are held to their places by springs of moderate strength, the pressure of which may be easily regulated. The oscillating motion of the mullers serves to keep the pulp in a constant state of agitation, thoroughly mixing it, and passing it under the mullers without resort to any of the various expedients employed in Pans where a circular motion is maintained. The peculiar construction of this machine admits of its being worked with a much smaller charge of quicksilver, to any given amount of pulp than the flat-bottomed Pans. The spiral springs greatly assist in the work of reduction, by allowing the free admission of the pulp between the mullers and discs, so that the pulp is made to actually work upon itself—as the dust of the diamond is made to reduce the gem itself. The advantage derived of this avoiding all trituration in the presence of quicksilver, must be apparent to any one at all acquainted with gold or silver amalgamation.

Trials made with this machine in the presence of experts, during the last six months, have been pronounced highly satisfactory. It is peculiarly well adapted to employment by small mining operators in distant localities, as it can readily be taken to pieces and packed upon mules.

A large size machine is constructed without dies or mullers, but simply with arms to act as stirrers, to be used in connection with several of the Amalgamators as a "Separator," as it is found that the peculiar motion given to these arms, in connection with the concave shape of the body of the machine, renders it most effectual for such a purpose.

RECORD OF THE CAMPAIGNS.

THE feature of the week is the occupation of Goldsboro by Sherman, the junction of a portion of his army with Schofield's forces, and their combined movement westwardly towards Raleigh. The latest despatches are only to the 22d, which leave the news some nine days behind. Sherman's march seems, thus far, a grand and continual triumph. According to a correspondent, the rebels appeared content to act as escort to his army, trotting along in front as if they had captured his whole force. Sheridan had arrived safely at White House. Various speculations are afloat as to "the war clap which will soon be heard from" that the New York Commercial gives circulation to. The wise ones predict that the unexpected source will be the Shenandoah; that Hancock, having thoroughly organized his veteran corps, will make a grand sweep down the valley, following nearly in the route of Sheridan, and, entreaching himself at the north gate of Richmond, will await the concentration of Grant's auxiliaries, and if the rebel capital is not evacuated in the meantime, will compel an unconditional surrender. This is a prediction; as a matter of curiosity, its fulfilment is worth looking for. Other matters of interest are appended in this week's record:

March 16.—Sherman on his march towards Fayetteville met with little obstruction. At Columbia he destroyed the immense arsenals and railroad establishments and 46 cannon. At Cheraw, a town on the south bank of the Great Pedee, he found much machinery and war material, including 25 cannon and 5,600 barrels of gunpowder. In Fayetteville he found 20 pieces of artillery and other material.

In the attack made by Hampton on Kilpatrick's headquarters at daylight on the 10th, Kilpatrick, having escaped capture, formed his men and drove the enemy with great loss, recapturing about all he had lost. Hampton lost 86, left dead on the field.

A letter from Newbern states that our forces occupy Kingston, and are repairing the bridge across the Neuse river, which will be finished in a few days. The rebel ram was burned. The enemy were demoralized. On leaving Kingston for Goldsboro most of the North Carolina troops belonging to the Eastern part of the State, left the ranks and returned to their homes.

On the 12th, the Mayor of Kingston surrendered the city. The enemy left 700 dead on the field before crossing the river.

The rebel ram Neuse, destroyed by the rebels at Kingston, had a crew of ninety men, exclusive of officers, who surrendered. On the ram were 21 hermetically sealed cans of powder, two 100-pounders and two 68-pound rifled guns.

Despatches from New Orleans to the 18th state that Gen. Canby was near Mobile, and an attack would be made within five days.

Forrest was reported at West Point, Miss., with 3000 men.

March 20.—Sheridan arrived safely at White House, on the night of the 19th. After leaving Columbia movements were made northward, striking the Virginia Central Railroad and destroying it at several points. Two days were occupied in accomplishing this. Sheridan next moved to the Fredericksburg road, marching to the two crossings of the South Anna, which were found defended by infantry behind earthworks. A charge was made; the rebels were scattered and their guns captured. Several skirmishes took place, and Early narrowly escaped capture. Sheridan lost only 50 men and two officers. Nearly 200 negroes and 300 rebel prisoners came in with him. He had to turn back a large number of negroes, as he was unable to feed or protect them. He has been supplied at White House with everything he might need for future movements. Longstreet, with his corps, is said to be lurking in his neighborhood.

Admiral Lee reports to the Navy Department that he had defeated the rebel Gen. Roddy, and destroyed his camp at the mouth of the Elk river, Ala. He reports a strong growing Union feeling in Alabama, and thinks there is no doubt of that State soon returning to her allegiance to the government.

An official order has been issued from the rebel Cabinet for the immediate raising of negro regiments for the rebel armies.

The New Orleans Picayune of March 13th, says that an attack was made on two of the batteries defending Mobile Bay, on the previous Saturday, by our monitors. Two of them silenced the batteries, and drove the men from their guns.

March 21.—Major R. B. Compton arrived at Washington with despatches from Sheridan. He brought 17 battle flags captured from Early in the recent battles in the Shenandoah.

Correspondence between Davis, Lee and Grant concerning a military convention to settle our difficulties, is published. Davis closed his letter, giving his authority to act, with these words: "Enter into such an arrangement as will cause at least a temporary suspension of hostilities."

News from Sherman confirms that he occupied Goldsboro without much opposition. The centre arrived at that place on the 21st, and formed a junction with Schofield's force at a point eleven miles east of Goldsboro. On the night of the 19th, Johnston attacked a Union force near Bentonville, and was successful the first part of the day, having captured three guns; but the rebel General's despatch says that in the evening the Federals "received reinforcements and assumed the offensive, which was with difficulty resisted by the rebels until dark." We captured the 46th North Carolina rebel regiment.

The Commercial's Hatcher's Run correspondent of the 18th, says that our troops there had been under arms for 36 hours, expecting an attack from the enemy. Sherman and Schofield are reported moving up the Weldon road. The same authority states that "a war clap will soon be heard in a quarter least expected from friend or foe."

Before leaving Fayetteville, Sherman destroyed the extensive arsenal there. It was the largest in the South. Every cotton mill and several residences were also destroyed. Six steamers were burned.

A squad of 245 rebel deserters, including one officer, came into the Union lines on the 24th, and reached Washington.

March 22.—Refugees from Richmond, arriving in our lines on the James river, report that great consternation prevails in the rebel capital. The government have been sending war materials, machinery, etc., for some time to Danville and Lynchburg. Sheridan has put a stop to this transportation in a great measure, by destroying the Lynchburg and Richmond canal, the only means of communication left. The Danville road is almost worn out, with no material to repair it. It is said that Stephens, Hunter and Lee are hopeless of the rebellion, and have so informed Davis. The arming of the slaves is too late.

Sherman having called for reinforcements for his army during their further march northward, an immense number of troops, were promptly sent from Beaufort to Goldsboro, preparatory to meeting the main army of Johnston. A battle was imminent; hence Sherman's army was increased to an overwhelming force, the extent of which may lead to a general retreat, or a surrender of the enemy. Johnston was reported within five miles of Raleigh, and a part of Lee's army had gone to reinforce him.

The rebel pirate Shenandoah arrived at Melbourne on February 25th. She had burned eleven ships on her voyage from the Cape to Melbourne.

LOCAL MATTERS.

Dr. Gunn has been appointed Assessor of Internal Revenue for this District.

The trial of Moses Frank, for forgery, concluded by the jury disagreeing after having been out twenty-five hours.

The North Star having broken her shaft, no mail steamer left New York on the 3d ult.; the mails by the steamer which left on the 13th ult. will be due about the 7th inst.

The captain and mates of the Great Republic have been convicted on the charges of cruel and unusual treatment of some of their sailors while clothed with a "brief authority."

Smith, one of the passengers by the Derby from Hongkong, died at the pest-house of small-pox, Tuesday. The other patients are said to be doing well. There would seem to be no danger of a spread of the contagion.

A despatch has been received in this city, directing a hall to be engaged for the celebrated pianist, Gottschalk, who will leave New York for California, by steamer of April 3d, and will give a series of concerts here.

James McConnell was convicted of cutting his wife's throat with intent to commit murder, and was sentenced to one year at San Quentin. The wife's testimony was mainly instrumental in procuring his conviction. Before sentence was passed she filed an affidavit that she did the cutting, and that her husband had no hand in inflicting the wounds.

John D. Marvey and Manuel Buzzi rode their horses on Stockton street, Wednesday afternoon; James W. Deas, in disregard of the rules of the course, attempted to cross the track, and was run over and considerably injured. The many accidents which have happened from carelessness of this nature should warn pedestrians to be more cautious. A horse might be made to stumble, and its "fast" rider have his neck broken, when there would be general weeping and wailing. Marvey and Buzzi were arrested—as if it were not bad enough for the "gay boys" to have had their innocent diversion interfered with and their valuable lives endangered by the stupid foot traveller!

During the past week a number of sudden deaths have occurred: Charles S. Norris died at the West End Hotel, of congestion of the brain; he was about thirty years of age. . . J. M. McDonald, proprietor of the Eclipse Livery Stables, on Pacific street between Kearny and Montgomery, was stricken with apoplexy while riding on the Presidio road, and expired. Deceased was a native of Ireland, aged 40 years; he leaves a wife and three children. . . A laborer, known only as "Sam," fell and expired in a fit at Griffin's fish warehouse on Davis street. . . Charles Degan, (German,) a cigar and tobacco dealer on Steuart street, near Folsom, died of apoplexy. . . Philip Grosse, a shoemaker on Battery street, was drowned in the bay. He was near-sighted, and probably walked off Broadway wharf accidentally.

INTERIOR ITEMS.

The San Rafael Journal says that Bolinas township, Marin county, is becoming the centre of attraction to oil-seekers.

The Alpha (Gold Hill) mine was sold at Sheriff's sale, recently, and was purchased by Geo. Jones for about $40,000.

A splendid fifteen-stamp quartz mill for the Keystone Company at Austin is on its way out from New York.

Charles P. Eaton, who stole money from letters in the Marysville Post Office, was sentenced by Judge Hoffman to ten years in the State Prison.

George Randall, of San Pablo, Contra Costa county, was killed by the accidental discharge of a gun upon which he was leaning, March 27th.

A Catholic church will soon be erected at Dutch Flat, Placer county; the sum of $1,400 has been contributed for the purpose.

The residence of T. J. Lockhart, situated about eleven miles from Marysville, in Sutter county, was destroyed by fire on the 25th ult. The fire was the work of an incendiary. Loss about $5,000; no insurance.

Capt. C. Warner has been appointed Postmaster at Virgin, on the recommendation of Senator Stewart. John Church, the late Postmaster, having been elected State Printer, was thereby disqualified for the Federal position.

The Wilmington Journal says that "Three-fingered Jack" recently left Fort Yuma for Guaymas, in a boat with four other men. When about six hundred miles away from any inhabitant they had occasion to land; as soon as Jack's companions were on shore, Jack shot one dead and wounded another; the other two fled.

The Nevada Gazette says it is feared that the hard frost of Sunday night, March 26th, destroyed some of the prospective fruit crop in that neighborhood. Mr. Bays, living a few miles from Grass Valley, states that his entire pear crop has been nipped in the bud.

Heavy teams from California, (says the Virginia Enterprise of the 26th ult.), freighted with goods for our various business houses, are again becoming numerous in our streets. Soon our principal thoroughfares will be crowded with these sloops of the Sierras. Immense quantities of freight, including a great deal of heavy machinery, are awaiting transportation over the mountains.

The Board of Directors of the State Agricultural Society are making arrangements for the annual fair, and the indications are very encouraging that the exhibition will be fully equal to any preceding one. Dr. John F. Morse, one of California's most pleasing speakers and profound scholars—a man in whom the progressive spirit of the age is fully developed, yet tempered by sound judgment and a cultivated taste—has been invited to deliver the address of the occasion.

The trial of George Beale and George Baker for the murder of Mr. Delaney, an aged man, closed at Salem, Oregon, March 25th. Over sixty witnesses were examined, and a chain of circumstantial evidence produced almost unequalled in criminal records. The jury returned a verdict of guilty. The prisoners were sentenced to be hung May 15th. Beale begged to be shot, rather than hung, which was denied.

An Englishman named Berry committed suicide on the 25th ult. at Alviso. He was about 60 years old, of temperate habits, and had been doing a prosperous business as a merchant. What his troubles were is not known to his friends, but the remark that they were greater than he could bear, and a request in regard to his property, gave the only intimation that he was tired of life.

The Marysville Express is informed by a gentleman who has made a tour through the mining districts in the upper portion of Yuba and Nevada counties, that he never before saw such general activity as prevails generally throughout that portion of the country. While the heavy works are being pushed with great activity, he says that wherever water has been introduced rockers and pans have been brought into service, and the present mining season, which has hardly yet been opened, will be the most prosperous that has been known for many years.

The Shasta Courier is happy over recent developments in the mines of that county. The editor has the good fortune to own feet in the Kellinger (perhaps in other claims, but of that we have his confession,) and recently specimens containing a large percentage of virgin silver were taken therefrom. . . The Baxter is producing splendid representative bricks of gold and silver, and is set down as a "reliable institution." . . The Spring Creek mill is procuring new machinery for saving its gold; it has sufficient rock, easy of access, to employ it for all coming time, with a good yield of ore. . . Dr. Hall, of Janesville, has a son in Idaho who has been urging his father to join him, as he had diggings there that would pay from four to ten dollars a day. The old gentleman accepted the invitation, but was detained by heavy snows, and meanwhile worked away at a hill claim in Shasta county which had been paying small wages. Recently he struck a better thing than Idaho promised, and his claim is now paying an ounce a day to the hand.

THE ELECTROPATHIC INSTITUTE, No. 645 Washington street, established February 12th, 1860, by an association of scientific gentlemen, for the cure of disease and the suppression of quackery.

Persons suffering from disease can rely upon the most scientific and honorable treatment at the above Medical Institute, and should their cases be within the limit of cure, the Resident Physician will warrant them a perfect and permanent relief from their affliction. And if their case be incurable, he will so state, and advise them of the best method of relief, so far as science can go to accomplish the object.

The basis of treatment at the Institute is the electro-pathic system; but the Resident Physician, J. H. JOSSELYN, M. D., being a graduate of the University of Pennsylvania, considers himself competent to treat with medicines, but, in no case, will he make use of mercurials, those life-destroying drugs; but, instead, will use the most approved vegetable remedies.

Since the establishment of the Institute, almost every nameable disease has been treated with success, especially those complaints which have been ill-treated by quacks, the names of which should never be printed in a newspaper.

Females should bear in mind, that the only safety in the treatment of complaints peculiar to their sex, is to have a physician who has made the female economy his particular study. In the resident physician at the Institute, they will find a surgeon who can sympathize with them in their troubles, and relieve them, no matter what they may be.

To the rheumatic and nervous person, this Institute offers the blessing of certain and permanent cure.

For those suffering from the effects of mercury, and those diseases for which mercury is usually given, there is no remedy so sure as the Electropathic system, as practiced at the Institute, 645 Washington street.

Come one, come all, and receive the blessings of health!

The motto is—a perfect cure or no money required! All letters answered with promptness and with pleasure, if directed to

J. H. JOSSELYN, M. D.,
 Resident Physician, Electropathic Institute,
 645 Washington st., San Francisco.

ALLEN'S

LUNG BALSAM!

THE REMEDY FOR CURING

CONSUMPTION, COUGHS, COLDS,

ASTHMA, CROUP,

DISEASES OF THE THROAT, BRONCHITIS,

Pains and Oppression of the Chest or Lungs,

DIFFICULT BREATHING,

AND ALL THE

DISEASES OF THE PULMONARY ORGANS.

ITS ACTION IS EXPECTORANT, ALTERATIVE, SUDORIFIC, SEDATIVE, DIAPHORETIC and DIURETIC, which renders it one of the most valuable remedies known for curing diseases of the lungs. It excites expectoration, and causes the lungs to throw off the phlegm or mucus, changes the secretions and PURIFIES THE BLOOD; heals the irritated parts; gives strength to the digestive system, brings the liver to its proper action, and imparts, beyond the possibility of doubt, strength to the whole system. Such is the immediate and satisfactory effect, that it is warranted to break up the most distressing cough in a few hours' time, if not of too long standing. It is warranted to give entire satisfaction even in the most confirmed cases of Consumption. It is warranted not to produce costiveness, which is the case with most remedies, or affect the head, as it contains no Opium in any form. It is warranted to be perfectly harmless to the most delicate child, although it is an active and powerful remedy for restoring the system. There is no real necessity for so many deaths by Consumption, when ALLEN'S LUNG BALSAM will prevent it, if only taken in time.

Sold by all Druggists. Price $1 per bottle.

TIRED OF THE BACKWOODS.

TWENTY-FIVE years ago last spring—that is, in the year 1839—my two brothers started from our township, east of Stanstead, Lower Canada, each with an axe and some “grub,” which meant bread and boiled pork, for a dark wood, ravine, and river a few miles distance from the paternal opening. They had manfully helped to clear land of heavy trees; to build, first a log-house, and then a frame-house, for their father, and then they wanted another world, or farm, to conquer. With young, strong hearts and hauds, they went on to their section of wild land.

Five years, and they had done wonders of work; then the youngest brother began to long for the comforts of civilization.

“I tell you, John,” he said, “I cannot stand it; five years I have lived, and moved, and had my being in the woods. True, we have done acres and ages of clearing, but we have been almost as much hermits as the bears in winter, while we were doing it. Now the mills are going, with a good and growing connection, and the house is ready for you to bring home a queen bee and begin a hive. My name is Walker.”

“The house is as much yours as mine, brother; and if you would just look about for a wife, you might be as happy as the day is long.”

“That is just what I want to do; but I do not want to choose from a quarter section, with three red-haired girls and one cross-eyed one. I want to go to Montreal and stay a year, and read and study, and see life. There is money in bank, and money always comes to you like bees to buckwheat. I must go. I shall break out and burn down Brookwood, where my palace is to be, if I can come back and settle into a contented Benedict or bachelor. I am going to Montreal, and Jack Burroughs and I will club our wits for a year, and see what sort of mark we shall make. We have both got some money to use or lose, and you shall see what will come of it.”

The steady, jog-trot brother, who never did anything with a rush, but always had his year's work done in three hundred days, remonstrated quietly against the loss of his chum.

“Literature is a losing business, mostly,” he said, “poets are always poor.”

“But I cannot be poor unless I turn out a dissipated scamp. There is enough here to come back to, and I must see the world, and sing my song through a periodical, or I shall be desperate.”

The end of all their talk was that my literary brother went to Montreal. Jack Burroughs was weary of smoking cigars on the steps of his hotel, of ogling pretty girls at church, driving fast horses, and doing nothing else. He was therefore delighted to join a “congenial spirit” in a monthly magazine. The Portfolio was charmingly got up, and contained poems with faultless rhymes, sketches of good society, not drawn from life; letters from abroad written at home; epigrams with the stings kindly left out; and satires penned in a charitable spirit. There was a serial written by Jack, full of naughty people—ten disreputable and two decent characters. Contributors saw themselves in print sometimes, for my brother was a generous youth, and he was editor-in-chief. A young lady wrote from Daisy Dell, and enclosed an original poem; the letter was post-marked Scrogg's Hollow, it was sealed with a red wafer, (remember this was in a colony twenty years ago,) it was written on coarse paper, and yet the elegant young editor was “taken” with the poem. The young sprig wrote encouragingly to the young bud. The poetess took pattern by his letter, and improved her next missive, though the paper was still coarse, and the wafer differed from its predecessor only in being blue. There was tenderness and grace and beauty in her lines, though she had never seen Paris note-paper, or envelopes, or ladies' sealing-wax of various delicate colors, and seals with pretty mottoes. It was plain from her response, that she was a close observer, and also that she could only evoke beauty from her own heart, and not from a stationer's shop. At first it was pleasant pastime to the young poet to promote the improvement of the young poetess, who was only fifteen. After a time he had queer fits of palpitation when her letters came or ought to have come; and finally, when the summer days grew long, he decided to go into the country for health, relaxation from arduous duties, and trout-fishing.

“Let me see her MS., governor.”

The governor hesitated.

“Hand over her letters, and I will write her life, and tell you her fortune and character, and all that sort of thing. You will not, eh? Then she seals with a red wafer, and writes on whity-brown paper, and commits all sorts of sins against taste. I judge a woman by her stationery when I don't see her, and by her gloves and hose when I do.”

“She writes like a Hemans, Jack.”

“But your invisible inamorata writes on villainous paper, and in an unformed, ungraceful hand, and you are ashamed of her.”

“I have told you no such thing; but suppose you are right, would you find fault with nectar because you had to drink it out of pewter?”

“To be sure I would. I am fond of the everlasting fitness of things, the harmonies of the universe, and all that sort of thing. Diamonds should not be set in copper or lead.”

“I am going down to Daisy Dell on Monday.”

“You don't say so! What a gathering of hearts and darts, of moonlight on the waters, of shimmering shadows, and singing of groves and doves, and all that sort of thing, there will be! How long do you tarry with the Peri in Paradise?”

“I'll write and tell you all about it.”

“Off in five minutes,” shouted the happy editor to his chum on Monday, as he climbed on the stage-coach, with his pockets full of fish-lines, artificial flies, siukers and floats, bullet-pouch, powder-horn, and caps, a bundle of fishing rods, and a rifle in a case.

“All good luck to you, governor,” said Jack, looking up, but not climbing to shake hands. “Write and let me know what sort of fish you catch; and if you don't catch any, let me know for my comfort.”

The traveller was broiled, and baked, and buried in the dust that day; and finally he was set down before a village inn, though Scrogg's Hollow was a slight apology for a village. The inn was a large white building, lacking the inevitable green blinds of this country of sunshine and sunstrokes, and it stood on a corner in “the village of Mayfield,” without a tree to shade it, though no one likes lukewarm beer, coffee, or black strap.”

The two front rooms of this “house of entertainment,” were bar and reception room. The bar-room where the traveller made his first entry, was papered with many-colored pictures of a travelling menagerie. There was a green elephant, a red lion, a blue leopard, an incredible woman taking an impossible leap from a pony to a “high horse” on the wall; and a live dog as big as a moose, three chairs, and a bench on the floor. There was a pen in one corner, containing what such enclosures always contain. The poet was not enchanted, and he took his leather bag to the next room. The carpet was red and yellow, the curtains were red, the hearth-rug was red, the table-covering was red and blue. The looking-glass was festooned with rose-colored paper, the fireplace had a screen of the same. There was a sofa and some chairs, covered with horsehair, and an open door-way led into a bed-room that smelt just like the inside of the stage-coach. There was no bell-pull, and the hungry youth waited till some one passed the door, and then ordered dinner. A tidy girl came then, with her hair elaborately curled and a bow of red ribbon in it. “At least we shall have a white table-cloth,” said mentally the melting guest. No such thing. The repast was laid on the blue and red cover, and a plate with red flowers, and no napkin. After a time a dish of smoking boiled potatoes, and fried ham and eggs appeared. A piece of mince pie, the contents of which were chopped by a lazy boy, was set for dessert. The beer was sour and warm, and the poet ordered tea; it came quickly, and had a red look and a taste of brick-dust, but it was the only thing in the room that was not hot. The discomfited diner essayed conversation with the spruce waitress.

“Do you know James Brown, of this town?” he asked.

“He's an own uncle of mine. He's a good forehanded man, is uncle Brown; but he's old. He says he never took a newspaper, or bought a book except the Bible and the almanac; and yet he's got a girl who writes for the papers, and she does not doubt she will write a book one of these days. She writes real pretty verses, though she is two years younger than I am.”

“Is she as pretty as her cousin?” asked the gallant young man.

“I don't think either of us will be hung for our beauty: but Minnie is cross-eyed, and she stoops, and she is very thin; and she does not care how she looks very much, if she can get a book or a chance to write.”

“Here's a go,” thought the poet. “Where is Mr. Brown's house?”

Toward evening my elegant brother (he had nearly all the grace and charm there was in the family) strolled up the slope. Two more square wooden houses, like the inn, stood out under the sky, to be burned in summer and frozen in winter. Not a tree except those in the orchard was in sight, and that was some distance from the dwelling. He called at Mr. Brown's, and asked for a drink of water. A gentle lady, who did not look as though her husband was exactly a “congenial spirit,” with the Bible and almanac for his only reading, called to her daughter, saying: “Minnie, dear, you will draw some fresh water.” Wilhelmina Brown was the poetess of my brother's dreams. There she stood, what people call “all warp and no filling”—a girl of fifteen, tall, unformed, with arms like sticks, bare and freckled; red hair, on its way to auburn, but this hot day looking decidedly red; and, possibly worse than this, she squinted. No mistake about it; one eye looked one way, and the other some other way. She brought a cup of cool water, and spoke in a sweet voice, though timidly. She wiped her wet hauds on her white and blue cheek apron—not gracefully, for she was bashful; and the gentleman was finer and handsomer than any she had ever seen. Brother came home, and stayed a few weeks, went hunting and fishing, and wrote a large package of poetry, and “Rural Rambles,” for the Portfolio. In due time he returned to Montreal. Somehow the Portfolio failed of success. It could not be for want of talent of all sorts. Somehow Miss Brown's last two letters remained unanswered. They came to hand when the editor was in the country; and Jack Burroughs had a very proper sense of their want of taste and elegance. Brother read Law, and, for aught I know, Phisic and Divinity, and wrote; and alternated between Grassville and Montreal for some years. At last he began to ask: “Why do I live?” “Of what use am I?” “Do I make the world happier or better?” He went abroad, he made a visit to England, to France and Italy, to try to answer his questions. He went as a student of men, of government, to answer his questions. He studied very humbly, and recorded very honestly; and he would sooner have abjured capital letters altogether than place them at the beginning of lines enough to make a sonnet. So entirely cured was he of poetry.

In Paris my charming brother was at home. He had a pride in speaking French like a Frenchman. He visited the salons of distinguished women. He became the friend of the beautiful Madame Levernier, the pet of Lafayette, now seventy years old, and as lovely as an infant. In the home of Madame Levernier he met persons of true distinction, and of almost all nations. One day Madame said to him: “I will show you this evening one of the most beautiful of your countrywomen. She came to me on her way to Italy. She has returned full of inspiration and beauty.” Brother waited impatiently for the evening, with an undefined presentiment in his heart. When he found himself honored by the promised introduction he did not feel as if he and the lady needed to become acquainted. She seemed to be spiritually of his family. “Surely,” he said, “in some anterior state of existence I must have known this lady.” Miss Lebrun was tall and regal in her style of beauty. Her rich auburn hair was dressed as a coronal, and her amber robes, shaded with black lace, draped her for a most imposing picture. She opened her mouth, like the fairy, to speak gems and pearls; and her companion gave himself up to the overmastering joy of love. Madame Levernier watched the impression made by her favorite with delight. There was a conjunction of happy stars. The gentleman solicited permission to accompany his new friend through the Louvre. She graciously granted it, promising him a note next day, to fix a time for their visit. More joy! He should see her handwriting. Next day he received a charming rose-colored envelope, sealed with daintiest care; but within was a worn and time-discolored half-sheet of paper, on which was written the following:

“MY FRIEND: We have met again. The cross-eyed, red-haired, unformed girl of fifteen is forgotten. The dream of my life, that began in brightness, that gave me the germs of education, that had in it the golden clue of hope and heaven, was dashed in darkness and despair. But the true soul finds always its resurrection. I am no longer a child full of tremulous fear, but a woman, born to dare and accomplish. You will not think me presumptuous because I say this. You know me better. I welcome your friendship with a true appreciation, but not with a brighter hope than formerly. I want to introduce you to the friends with whom I am travelling. To-morrow at twelve, at the Louvre, you will meet them.”

“Your grateful friend,”

“WILHELMINA BROWN.”

“P. S.—This is written on the blank leaf of your last letter; thanks for my paper. I ought, perhaps, to say that I have been in Italy with the family of my uncle, my mother's brother. He had a diplomatic appointment from the President of the United States. My mother was born in New York, where my uncle has always resided. The last five years I have spent with these dear relatives, and I have had the best worldly advantages. I fancy I have made some improvement.”

“W. B.”

Brother returned with Miss Brown's party. He built a house at Brookwood, and brought home the regal poetess the next year, with no fear of his committing arson. I can answer for him that he has not shown the slightest symptom of “breaking out” for twenty years.

SPANISH PROVERBS.—Since I wronged you I have never liked you.

To be a merchant, the art consists more in getting paid than in making sales.

A WORTHY townsman of ours, who goes by the sobriquet of the Deacon, was met by a lady friend as he emerged from a saloon, and accosted thus: “Good morning, Deacon; but I am sorry to see you coming out of such a place.” To which he drily replied: “Why, madam, would you have me stay there all the time?”

Stephen Culverwell and Lyon & Co., Frewers, are now using it, and to them I refer.

ON SAILING VESSELS

It has been used to great advantage, where, on account of hailing winds, it is difficult to keep fire in the gully.

FOR SMOKY CHIMNEYS

It is a sure cure, and has been used on the Russ House and other first-class buildings in this city.

FOR VENTILATION,

It is unexcelled, and is recommended to architects and owners of buildings where ventilation is required.

FOR MINING PURPOSES

It is well adapted, thoroughly removing all foul air from shafts and tunnels.

The proprietor also refers to the following gentlemen, who have used it: Capt. Lassen, brig Crimea; Dr. Nuttall, Calhoun & Son, Printers; Edgerly & Wickman, Ship Chaulders; J. B. Quintin, builder; Philip Caduc, Esq.

HENRY TOOMY, Plaintiff, vs. JAMES H. RAY, Defendant.—Action brought in the District Court of the Fifteenth Judicial District of the State of California, in and for the City and County of San Francisco, and the Complaint filed in said City and County of San Francisco, in the office of the Clerk of said District Court.

The People of the State of California send greeting to JAMES H. RAY, Defendant.—You are hereby required to appear in an action brought against you by the above named Plaintiff in the District Court of the Fifteenth Judicial District of the State of California, in and for the City and County of San Francisco, and to answer the complaint filed therein, within Ten Days, (exclusive of the day of service,) after the Service on you of this Summons—if served within this County; or, if served out of this County, but in this District, within Twenty Days; otherwise, within Forty Days—or judgment by default will be taken against you, according to the prayer of said Complaint.

The said action is brought to recover in U. S. gold coin, the sum of $946, alleged to be due from defendant to plaintiff upon a certain promissory note, and upon an account stated, as set forth and alleged, in plaintiff's complaint, with interest on said sum of $946, at the rate of two per cent. per month, from May 25th, 1864, and costs of suit.

And you are hereby notified that if you fail to appear and answer the said complaint, as above required, the said plaintiff will take judgment against you, payable in U. S. gold coin for said sum of $946, and interest as aforesaid and costs.

Given under my hand and Seal of the District Court of the Fifteenth Judicial District of the State of California, in and for the City and County of San Francisco, this 19th day of December, in the year of our Lord, one thousand eight hundred and sixty-four.

SAN FRANCISCO, SATURDAY, April 8th, 1865.

IN the words of a distinguished morning journal which is not only inspired itself at times but which also occasionally becomes the source of inspiration to others: "I write this with an eagle's quill."

Because Richmond is ours!

It ought to be, for the Lord knows we have been long hours enough in getting it.

Richmond is taken!

Like many other prescriptions it had to be well shaken before being taken, but that doesn't matter much so that our armies have gone through it in single phial at last. If that remark does not move my friends to laughter I will fling this eagle's quill aside and write with other squills.

It is a fortunate thing that there are not many Richmonds in the field, for if they were we'd have to take them all, and one in about four years is all that our city can stand. I question whether our people will get over this last celebration for four years to come.

Carpentier—President of the Telegraph Company, author of all the despatches to the associated press, and an old friend of mine—"we were boys together"—telegraphed me on Monday evening that the wires were down beyond Omaha, but that he had good reason for believing that Richmond had fallen, adding, with an electric wink, that it had fallen into very proper hands.

And he also added: If there are any tears shed on the occasion be sure they are not Carpentier's.

I knew very well that as Richmond fell greenbacks would go up, for they lay in opposite scales and both were fishy. Accordingly I operated with an eagle's quill and the result was that I had to conceal myself the next day, as a gentleman to whom I had contracted to deliver several hundred thousand dollars in the currency of the realm—perhaps I should say currency of the realm, for it is paper, and much is afloat—came after me with an eagle's claw.

The consequence was that I oscillated between the Bay View Park and the Bank Exchange Parker—of this I am positive, though the collocation may seem comparative and this explanation superlative. Nobody saw me, for one eighth of the town had been summoned before the Court of Inquiry to testify against O'Byrne, and the other seven-eighths to testify in his favor.

Of course the majority had it. I was very much reminded of the celebrated sheep-stealing trial, where two men saw the prisoner with a sheep on his back, but he brought up ten men who didn't, and was of course triumphantly acquitted, the balance of evidence being decidedly in his favor.

I only returned to town yesterday, after an absence of four days. Talk of what one day may bring forth, think of what four days may bring one!

Many things had happened in the meanwhile. Several gentlemen who participated largely in the celebration had got sober. Amos Clafflin had joined the Dashaways, and was a member in excellent standing; he contemplated a removal to the Mission, the construction of a horse railroad, and the surrender of his latch-key to his landlady.

It fills my soul with joy to ascertain that not one of these virtuous resolves have been carried into immediate execution, for one should never do to-day what can be put off until to-morrow.

I also found that School Director Thompson had borrowed an eagle's quill and written a despatch to his fellows of the Board of Education, which may well be called a "happy despatch," as he managed to rip himself up in it very much after the Japanese fashion. It was smart enough certainly, but discretion is the better part of wit as well as of valor, and after all it was one of those letters which had better not been written.

I also found that the Mexican steamer was in, and they told me my "stock was looking up."

I believed it, as to my certain knowledge, it had been lying flat upon its back for some time, it could not well look any other way.

It has been determined to levy only one more assessment, and this is for the purpose of purchasing "pans." It is pandering to a depressed taste, I fear, but still I intend to pay my proportion of the cost, as a refusal on my part might cause a panic in the market.

Pan was a heathen deity I believe, who used to live by the riverside and make whistles out of reeds. I fancy he'd whistle nowadays if he stood where I do and had to "pan out" as often as I do. If this sort of thing goes on long I intend to apply to the Nevada Legislature and have my name changed to Capt. Pannix.

However, I trust that the result of the present experiment will not be a flash in the pan, and that the retort, when we come to retort the amalgam, will prove a "retort courteous."

On my return from the country I found they had mounted a "Swamp Angel" at Maguire's, invented by a talented young townsman of mine named Sears—who must not, however, be confounded with Miss Richardson's "Northern Seer." It will be seen at a glance that the name of one is singular, while that of the other is not.

I was rejoiced to find that Gen. Maguire's "Swamp Angel" proved more effectual in quelling secession than Gen. Gillmore's did, for behold, the Perry had returned to her allegiance and once again gladdened the heart of audiences with her pretty ways and means.

I was the more glad of it, because I did not want to see her like the Mrs. Peri of whom Moore sings:

— at the gate
Of Eden stand, disconsolate.

It seems to me that Mr. Wheatleigh must have repeated Hamlet's famous soliloquy:

Toby, or not Toby, for some time in his mind before he made up his mind to be Toby. For the character does not give him scope enough for the full display of his powers.

Of course every one was delighted to see Mrs. Edwin win that applause as "Zoe," which she no doubt has now come to exact as a right, since it is generally conceded on all sides that

A thing of beauty is a Zoe forever!

I notice that the Magnolia is to be produced this afternoon and evening, and that it will be repeated Monday evening of next week. Unlike Gen. Gillmore's "Swamp Angel," it has not failed with the third or fourth trial.

Of course I can write of the Eureka, "I found it" immediately on coming into town. I don't know much about what is going on there, however, for I am afraid to go in often, lest the manager, who is looking out for a new "end man," should offer me an engagement. Were I in his place I should appoint one of the young ladies of the troupe to the position, for then we might playfully speak of the Witch of End'er, and write that she moved our Souls to mirth.

Another thing that I found on getting back to town was the Philharmonic—so called because the house is always filled on the occasion of its concerts. This was in full blast, in several full blasts, in fact.

I had the pleasure of hearing Miss Lizzie Allen sing, which would have atoned for deficiencies elsewhere among the members, had any existed, but I am glad to say that there was no need of viewing her singing as a sacrifice of atonement. Still, I knew what her tone meant the moment I heard it. Her voice is sweet, full and flexible, her style is excellent, and her manner on the stage good; I rather admire an apparent air of independence which seems to say to the audience that she is doing them a favor in singing to them at all.

The rest of the performance passed off so well that there is no need to particularize. So I will merely give the programme as translated by a friend of mine who took a Grosse seat if not the gross receipts.

"Euryanthe" (You're another!)..... Von Weber.

"Poet and Peasant"..... (Bohemian and Ranchero.)

I should like to mention the sustained effort of one old gentleman with a fiddle, who got off with his fiddle at the tap of the bell, every time. Generally the fiddle is an awkward instrument to play upon in public, as it suggests to the imaginative mind the idea of a meditative man nursing a baby and rubbing the small of its back at the same time. But that is neither here nor there. My old friend last night played well his part, there all the honor lies.

I have little more to record, except that they have been Patchen up a race between that horse and the brown gelding Fillmore over the Bay View Track, to come off Saturday for $4,000. Of course everything goes, and if everybody doesn't go the fault is their own if they are not there. With which remark I make my bongh, and you all may take leave of

AT THE DAWNING.

FRAIL little bark, on the rough ocean cast—
Ocean of Life, dark and wild!

Ah! many's the storm and cold cheerless blast,
E'en shipwreck, perhaps, e'er the voyage be past,
And thou art at rest, little child—

Poor one!

Safe from the storms dark and wild.

Poor little feet! that the thorns will make bleed—
Thorns 'mid the roses cast!

Thou'lt wander alone, for none will heed
If thy footsteps fail or thy tired feet bleed

Till the ending comes at last—

Weary feet!

And roses and thorns be past.

Wondering eyes! to be dimmed by tears,
Tears that are hid by a smile!
Blue eyes! to grow dim in the coming years,
For falsehood and sorrow weeping your tears;
Weeping 'neath the mask of a smile—
Sad eyes!

Weeping a weary while!

Poor little heart, that will ache so sore—
Ache with a cruel pain!
When dear hopes are gone, to return nevermore,
Ah! then, thou wilt ache till thou reachest a shore
Far over life's troubled main—

Little heart!

Where endeth all woe and pain.

INGLEX.

NEVER let grass grow on friendship's path.—Old French Proverb.

TOO LATE.
 TOO late thy honeyed words—
 Too late thy tears:
 A life is told by grief,
 And not by years.

And I have lived the woe,
 In one brief day,
 Of twice three score and ten—
 My heart is gray!

Thou canst not thrill its pulse
 With hope nor fear:
 The Day is well-nigh done;
 And Night is near.

Thou, in thy selfish thought,
 Wouldst have me live,
 When Life were worse than naught,
 But—I forgive.

Go! bathe no more the brow
 Thy lip once pressed;
 For I am weary now,
 And fain would rest!

CHAPTER XXIII.

TIDINGS OF SUSAN.

ABSORBED in the conflicting tortures and delights of his bondage, Francis Tredethlyn had thought very little of that missing cousin who had once been so near and dear to him. Now and then, when he had been most entirely under the spell of Maude Hillary's fascinating presence, the vision of a rosy rustic face, framed in a little dimity bonnet, had arisen suddenly before him, mutely reproachful of his forgetfulness and neglect, and he had resolved that on the very next day some new steps should be taken in the search for Susan Tredethlyn. But then, on that next day, there was generally some flower-show or matinée musicale, some boat-race at Putney or appointment to play croquet at Twickenham, in short, some excuse or other for devoting himself to Maude Hillary; and poor Susan's rustic image melted away into chaos. But Mr. Tredethlyn was suddenly startled into recollection of his neglected duty by the receipt of a letter from his solicitors, Messrs. Kursdale and Scardon, asking for an early interview, and announcing that they had an important communication to make respecting Miss Susan Tredethlyn, otherwise Miss Susan Turner.

An important communication! The Cornishman felt his face grow hot as he read the letter. Susan was found, perhaps, he thought. He had never mentioned her name to Maude Hillary, and now it might be that she would need all the devotion of a loving protector, perhaps even the strong arm of an avenger, at a time when his every thought was absorbed by his approaching marriage. The young man did not wait for any ceremonious appointment, but hurried off at once to Gray's Inn, and presented himself before Mr. Kursdale, the senior partner.

In the quiet office Francis Tredethlyn's hot eagerness tamed down a little before the matter-of-fact manner of the solicitor. There was a sober tranquillity in the aspect of the man, and of the place, which seemed to have a singularly soothing effect upon all human emotion. The sober little clock ticking on the grey stone mantelpiece, a skeleton clock, exhibiting its entire anatomy to the public eye, and superior to all meretricious adornment, seemed to be perpetually ticking out in the stillness—

"Let me advise you to take it easily; let me recommend you to take it quietly: whatever the Law can do for you will be done here; but it must be done in the Law's own way, which is very slow, and very complicated, and rather trying to human patience."

Mr. Kursdale received Francis with calm cordiality, and after a few stately compliments proceeded at once to business.

"You will remember that my opinion, and that of my partner—for I availed myself of his judgment in the matter—you will, no doubt, recollect, that after considerable study of the manuscript or journal which you confided to me, I came to the conclusion that the writer of that journal had contemplated imposing upon your cousin's simplicity by a mock marriage, a sham ceremonial, performed before some person falsely representing himself to be a district registrar. This opinion was really forced upon me by the wording of the diary. Look at the diary in what light I would—and I assure you I weighed the matter most carefully—I could not see my way to any other conclusion."

"I understand," answered Francis, "I knew the man was a scoundrel. I made that out, somehow or other, from his journal. I knew he meant mischief and treachery upon little Susie; but I couldn't make out what treachery till you opened my eyes to the truth."

"But suppose that, after all my care, I was too hasty in forming a conclusion. Suppose that we have been mistaken, Mr. Tredethlyn."

"How do you mean, sir?"

"Some days since, I happened to open a drawer which had been unopened for a long time, and hidden under a lot of other documents I found the diary which you entrusted to me. The sight of the manuscript reminded me of you and your missing cousin, so I suppose it was only natural that I should turn over the pages—not in the hope of finding any new meaning in them, however, for I had studied them too carefully for that. I turned them over, and while debating the question of a mock marriage, the thought suddenly flashed upon me that it would be at least very easy to ascertain if any genuine ceremonial had taken place in London. Remember, Mr. Tredethlyn, I did not for one moment imagine that there had been a real marriage, and I fully believed that the trouble I was about to take would be wasted trouble. If I had not from the first been firmly convinced that the writer of the diary contemplated a sham marriage, and nothing but a sham marriage, I should, at the outset, have done that which I only did the other day."

Francis Tredethlyn's impatience was so very evident that the lawyer, slow as he generally was, quickened his pace a little as he went on.

"I was determined to institute an investigation of the books of every registrar's office in the metropolis during the months of January, February and March, 1849. I entrusted a confidential clerk with this task, and three days afterwards he brought me the result of his investigation. On the 27th of February, 1849, Robert Lesley was married to Susan Turner, in the office of the district registrar for Marylebone. The registrar's name was Joseph Pepper; the names of the witnesses were Mary Banks and Jemima Banks, of No. 7, Woolcote Villas, St. John's Wood."

"Thank God!" ejaculated Francis, reverently. "Thank God, for my little cousin's sake, that this man was not the scoundrel we took him for."

"Whether such a marriage, contracted under a false name on your cousin's part, and it is very possible also under a false name on the part of the writer of the diary—whether such a marriage might not be open to dispute, is another question. However, the ceremonial, so far as it went, was genuine, and in any case there would be some little difficulty in setting it aside."

"It shall not be set aside!" cried Francis, "if I have the power to enforce it. Thank God for this, Mr. Kursdale, and thank you for the thought, late as it came, that led to the discovery of the truth."

"You must remember, though, my dear Mr. Tredethlyn," remonstrated the solicitor, who was almost alarmed by the young man's eagerness, "you must bear in mind that it is just possible there may have been some other Susan Turner and some other Robert Lesley married in the month of February, 1849, and that this registration may refer to them."

"I am not afraid of that," Francis answered, decisively. "No, the man meant to be a scoundrel, I dare say, but my little Susie's artless confidence touched his heart at the very last, perhaps, and he could not be such a villain as to deceive her. Rely upon it, Mr. Kursdale, the marriage was a genuine marriage, and I shall live to see my cousin righted, and to divide my uncle Oliver's money with her."

Mr. Kursdale stared at his client in blank amazement.

"You would—do that?" he asked, after a pause.

"Of course I would. Poor little, ill-used darling! The money was hers, every penny of it, by right. I—I meant at first to have restored it all to her; but new claims have arisen for me, and I can only give her half the fortune that should have been her own."

The solicitor stifled a groan.

"And now how am I to find Susie?" asked Francis. "This registration business gives us a new clue, doesn't it?"

"Unquestionably. We can at any rate hope to find the two witnesses, Mary and Jemima Banks, and from them we may discover your cousin's present whereabouts. I'll send a clerk to these Banks people to-morrow."

"Do you know, I think I'd rather go and look for them myself, and at once," said Francis. "I've been very neglectful of Susie's interests lately, and I feel as if I ought to do something to make up for my neglect. I'll go myself, Mr. Kursdale, and try to find out these people. If I fail, you must help me to find them. If I succeed, I'll come here to-morrow morning and tell you the result."

The young man wrote the address of the people in St. John's Wood in his pocket-book, shook hands with his legal adviser, and hurried away. He was so eager to atone for the neglect of the past by the activity of the present. He hired a Hansom in Holborn, and was on his way to St. John's Wood five minutes after he had left the lawyer's office. He sat with his watch open in his hand, while he made abstruse calculations as to the time it would take him to find the females, Mary and Jemima Banks, extort from them all the information they had to give, drive back to his hotel, reorganize his toilet, and then make his way to Twickenham. He had grown something of a dandy of late; he employed a West End tailor, belabored his honest head with big ivory-backed brushes, and bedewed his cambric handkerchief with the odorous inventions of that necromancer of the flower garden, Monsieur Eugène Rimmel. The big Cornishman smiled at his reflection in the glass sometimes, wondering at his own frivolity. But it was for Maude Hillary's sake that he brushed his hair laboriously every day, and grew critical in the choice of a waistcoat. He had even hired a man to wait upon, and had a little regiment of boot-trees in his dressing-room.

St. John's Wood proper is perhaps one of the most delightful suburban retreats in which the man who, yearning for the waving of green trees about his abode, is yet obliged to live within an easy cab drive from the City, can make a pleasant temple for his lures and penates. Dear little villas, embosomed in foliage; stately mansions, towering proudly out of half an acre of trimly-kept garden, invite the wealthy citizen to retirement and repose. The young lilacs and laburnams of to-day may represent but poorly the bosky verdures of the past, but still the Wood of St. John is a cool and pleasant oasis in the great arid desert of London.

But there are outskirts and dependencies of St. John that are not quite so pleasant—ragged wastes and shabby little terraces that hang like tattered edges disgracing a costly garment. These dismal streets and dreary terraces may not belong of right to St. John, but they hang about him and cling to him, and shelter themselves under the grandeur of his name nevertheless.

Woolcote Villas, St. John's Wood, were very pretentious little dwelling-places, fronted with damp stucco, and with a tendency to a mossy greenness of aspect that was eminently dispiriting. Woolcote Villas were of the Elizabethan order of architecture, and went off abruptly into peaks and angles wherever a peak or an angle was possible. How such small houses could require the massive stacks of Elizabethan chimneys which made Woolcote Villas appear topheavy and incongruous to the eye of the stranger, was an enigma only to be solved by the architect who designed those habitations; and why Woolcote Villas should each be finished off with a stuccoed mustard pot, popularly known as a Campanello tower, which was not Elizabethan, and not practicable for habitation, being open to the four winds of heaven, was another problem perpetually awaiting the same individual's solution.

The Hansom cabman, after driving through all the intricacies of St. John's Wood on different false scents, came at last upon Woolcote Villas, through the friendly offices of a milkman, and pulled up his horse before the door of number seven.

Francis alighted and rang a bell—a bell with a slack wire, which required to be pulled a great many times before any effect was produced. At last, however, the bell rang, and then, after a pause and another peal, the door was opened, and a slipshod servant maid, with a flapping circle of dirty net hanging from the back of her disorderly head, emerged from number seven, Woolcote Villas, and presented herself at the little gate before which Francis Tredethlyn was waiting.

The young man asked if Mrs. Banks was at home. Yes, she was at home, and Miss Banks also. Did he please to want the apartments?

Mr. Tredethlyn told her that he had particular business with Mrs. Banks, and that it was that lady whom he wished to see. The girl looked disappointed. There were a good many bills in the Elizabethan windows of Woolcote Villas, and the demands of lodgers were not equal to the supply of furnished apartments.

The sound of a tinkling piano, played very badly, greeted Mr. Tredethlyn as he entered the narrow passage. The dirty maidservant opened the door of the apartment whence the sound came, and Francis found himself in a shabby parlor, tenanted by a young lady, who rose from the piano as he entered, and who was very fine and yet very shabby, and a trifle dirty, like the parlor, and like Woolcote Villas generally. The young lady wore a greasy-looking black silk, relieved by a coquettish little apron of Stuart plaid, and adorned by all manner of ribbons and narrow velvets, with a good deal of mosaic jewellery in the way of hearts and crosses, and anchors and lockets; and her hair was turned back from her forehead, and flowed in graceful ringlets of the corkscrew order upon her stately shoulders. She was altogether a very extensively adorned young lady; and she gave a little start expressive of surprise and timidity, with a just slight admixture of pleasure, as Mr. Tredethlyn presented himself before her. Many single gentlemen had inspected the long-vacant lodgings, but there had been no one among them so good-looking, or so splendid of aspect, as this tall, broad-shouldered Cornishman, revised and corrected by his West-end tailor.

"The apartments, I suppose," the young lady said, eurtseying and simpering. "My 'ma being busy, perhaps you will allow me to show them to you. This is the parlor. If the use of a sitting-room only is required, with partial board, including dinner on Sundays, the terms would be seventeen and sixpence. Private apartments, without board, fifteen shillings, or with full board—"

The young lady would have proceeded further, but Francis Tredethlyn interrupted her.

"I beg your pardon," he said, "I don't require apartments; my business is quite of a different nature. Your name is Banks, I believe?"

The lady inclined her head graciously. Life was very dreary in Wooleote Villas, and the advent of a good-looking stranger could scarcely be otherwise than agreeable, even if he was not a prospective tenant.

"Mary—or Jemima—Banks?" asked Francis.

"I am Miss Jemima Banks," the young lady replied, with considerable dignity. She began to think the good-looking stranger inclined to be presumptuous; but Francis was too preoccupied to be aware of the intended reproof.

"I am very glad that I have been so fortunate as to find you," he said, "for I believe you can give me the information I want. You were present at a marriage before the registrar, at an office in Foltthorpe street, Marylebone, on the 25th of February, 1849. Can you tell me where the young lady who was married went after the ceremony? I have some right to ask this question, for Susan Tre—Susan Turner is my first cousin."

"Well, I never did!" exclaimed Miss Banks, surprised out of her stateliness. "Poor Susan was your cousin, was she? Why, she came home here a fortnight after her marriage."

"She came here?"

"Yes; she was lodging here before that, and she and her husband went off to Paris after the ceremony, and there was no breakfast and no nothing; and Mr. Lesley, he was always very high and mighty-like in his ways, he flung down a twenty-pound note upon the desk before the registrar, and when the man said something about change, he threw up his head scornful-like—it was a way he had if anything vexed him, 'There's your money,' he said, 'and don't let's have any humbug,' and then he dragged his poor little wife's hand through his arm, just nodded to me and mother, and walked off to the cab without a word, leaving me and mother in the registrar's office. The registrar was full of praises of the gentleman's generosity, and said he'd like to tie up half-a-dozen such couples every week, but mother was regularly cross about that twenty-pound note, and went on about it all the way home, saying, that Mr. Lesley had ground her down close enough about the rent for these rooms, and needn't go showing off his generosity to strange registers."

"And my cousin Susan went to Paris?"

"Yes, but only for a fortnight, and we was to keep the apartments for her, which we did, and at the end of a fortnight she came back, dressed beautiful, and with all sorts of lovely things in her boxes, and she was looking so well and so happy, and anybody would have thought she was the luckiest woman in the world. But mother, she used to shake her head about it, and say she never knew those secret sort of marriages to come to any good, because, when a gentleman begins by not wanting to own his wife, he's very apt to end by wishing he hadn't married her; but mother always looks at the black side of things, whether it's taxes, or whether it's lodgers, or whatever it is, so I didn't take much notice. Mrs. Lesley seemed very happy, and Mr. Lesley; for the first week or so, he stopped at home a great deal, and scarcely ever went out, except to take his wife out to dine, or to a theatre, or something of that kind, and they really seemed the happiest couple that ever was; but by-and-by Mr. Lesley went away; to college, his wife told me; and I shall never forget how she cried, poor thing, the night he left her, or how lonely she looked sitting in this room, where they'd been so happy together, with their little oyster suppers after the theatre, and everything that heart could wish. She'd got some books that he'd left behind him spread out before her on the table, and she was turning one of them over when I went in to see her.

"They're very hard to understand, Miss Banks," she said, "but I try to read them, because I want to be clever, and able to talk to Robert when he comes home."

After this she was almost always reading, poor little thing, and she'd sit in this room for days and days together; for she didn't like to go out alone, and mother does drive and worry so, that it wasn't often I could get out with her. Mr. Lesley was to be away three months, she told me; and I'm sure that poor thing used to count the hours, and minutes almost, wishing the time to go; but when the three months was up, there was no Mr. Lesley; he was going fishing somewhere in Wales with some grand friends, she told me, and wouldn't be home till the next vacation. I never saw any one so cut up as she was by the disappointment, though she wouldn't talk about it, only I could see every morning by her face, that she'd been lying awake half the night, crying her poor eyes out."

"Poor girl, poor girl!" murmured Francis Tredethlyn.

This all absorbing passion called love was a sorrowful thing then, he thought, let it come to whom it would, a onesided frenzy, a perpetual sacrifice, a self-imposed immolation.

"Pray tell me all you can about my cousin," he said to Miss Banks. "You cannot imagine how anxious I am to hear of her."

"I'm sure she and me was always the best of friends," answered the fair Jemima, with a touch of diplomacy; and if you did think of taking the apartments, me and mother would do all in our power to make you comfortable, if it was only on Mrs. Lesley's account: for she was one of the sweetest young creatures I ever knew. She stayed with us three weeks before she was married, and I never shall forget her pretty face the day she first came up from the country after the lodgings had been took for her."

"Mr. Lesley engaged the lodgings, I suppose."

"No, it was Mr. Lesley's brother."

"Oh, he had a brother, then?"

"Yes, his brother was something in the law, I think—a very nice gentleman, and almost the living image of Mr. Lesley himself."

"Can you give me a description of Mr. Lesley? I never saw him, and I want very much to know what kind of man he is."

Miss Banks hesitated for some moments.

"It's so difficult to give an exact description of any one," she said. "Mr. Lesley was a tall, handsome-looking man, with fair hair and blue eyes. I don't think I could describe him any nearer than that."

Francis Tredethlyn sighed. There are so many tall, handsome-looking men with fair hair and blue eyes; and it is chiefly in melodrama that people go about the world conveniently marked with a strawberry, or a coronet.

"Answer me one question," said Francis, eagerly, "before you tell me the rest of my cousin's history. Do you know where she is now?"

Miss Banks shook her head, and sighed despondently.

"No more than you do, sir," she exclaimed. "It's two years and a half ago since I set eyes upon Mrs. Lesley, and I don't know no more than the dead what's become of her since."

"Then she is as much lost to me to-day as she was yesterday," said Francis, sadly. "But you can at least tell me all you know of my poor cousin. It may help me to some clue by which to find her."

Jemima was evidently a good-natured girl. She begged Mr. Tredethlyn to be seated, and placed herself opposite to him.

"I'll call mother if you like," she said, "but I think I can tell you more about Mr. Lesley; mother is such a one to wander, and when one's anxious to know anything quick, it don't do to have to deal with a person whose mind's always harping upon lodgers and their ways. Of course everybody knows lodgers are tiresome, and nobody lets apartments for pleasure, and nobody would pay taxes if they could help it, and poor-rates are not expected to raise people's spirits; but if facts are disagreeable, that's no reason you should have them cropping up promiscuous in every style of conversation. Till now it used to be a relief to me to come and sit with Mrs. Lesley of an evening, and hear her troubles, if it was only for the sake of a change."

"I thank you heartily for having been good to my cousin," Francis Tredethlyn said, earnestly. He was thinking that he would drop into a jeweller's shop on his way homeward, and choose the handsomest diamond ring in the man's stock for Miss Jemima Banks.

"I don't know as I deserve any thanks, sir," answered the girl. "I couldn't help taking to Mrs. Lesley, and I couldn't help feeling for her when I saw her so solitary and so sad. Months and months went by before her husband came back to her, and when he did come her baby was born, and there was the cradle in the corner just by where you're sitting, and she seemed as if she couldn't make enough of the child."

"But Mr. Lesley, he didn't seem so wrapped up in the baby as she did," continued Miss Banks; "and I used to fancy she saw it and fretted about it. He couldn't take her out to dinner anywhere this time, nor yet to the theatre, on account of the child. She asked him once to take her for a drive somewhere in the country, and to take the child with them; but he laughed at her and said: 'I don't think there's a pleasanter sight in creation than an estimable mechanic in his best clothes, with three children in a wicker chaise, and a fourth in arms; but don't you think we may as well leave that sort of thing to the mechanic, Susie? the poor fellow has so few chances of distinguishing himself.' That was just the sort of speech Mr. Lesley was always making, half laughing, half scornful; he was always going on in a sneering way about the baby, and her being so fond of it, and devoting herself so much to it; and sometimes one of those nasty speeches of his would set his wife off crying, for her health wasn't very strong just then, and any little thing would upset her. And then he'd look at her with a hard, cruel look that he'd get sometimes, and throw his book into a corner, and get up and walk out of the house, banging the door to that degree that mother would be unnerved for the rest of the evening. Mr. Lesley took to stopping out very late this time, and used to let himself in with a latch-key, long after me and mother had gone to bed; but I know that Susan used to sit up for him, and I know that he used to be angry with her for doing it; for Woolcote Villas are slight-built, and I've heard him talking to her as I lay awake overhead. He was at home for some months this time off and on—but he'd be away for days together—and when he was at home he had a tired way like, that made me feel uncomfortable somehow to see him. He was always yawning, and smoking, and sitting over his books, or lying asleep upon the sofa; and I'm sure if I'd been Mrs. Lesley, I should have been glad when he took himself off. But lor' bless your heart! poor little thing, she fretted about his going away, just as if he'd been the kindest of husbands. He wasn't going back to college any more; he was going to Germany this time. I know she wanted to go with him, poor, tender-hearted thing; and I heard her say to him, so pitiful like, once: 'Oh, Robert, what will become of me when you are gone! If you would only take me!' But he only laughed at her, and cried out: 'What! abandon the baby?' So at last the time came for him to go, and his poor wife got paler and paler every day, till I'm sure she looked like a living corpse walking about the house," said Miss Banks, unconsciously paraphrasing Shelley.

"Lor, yes, what did he care for her looking white and sorrowful? He was more wrapped in his new portmanteaus, and travelling bags, and dressing-cases, and such like, than in his wife or his child. He went off as gay as could be, though he left Mrs. Lesley almost broken-hearted. And he didn't leave her too well off either, I know, though she always paid mother to the moment; but all her pretty dresses and bonnets that Mr. Lesley had bought her in Paris had grown shabby, and he hadn't bought her any new ones. She had so many excuses for him like, and pretending that he was very good to her. Poor dear thing! after he was gone away the baby was her only comfort; and I'm sure if it hadn't been for that child she'd have fretted herself away into the grave. Well, sir, the baby was four months old when Mr. Lesley went away to Germany, and he was only to be away three months at the longest, Susan told me: she was very friendly with me, and I always called her by her first name. And she used to count the days just as she did before; and she'd say to me often how the time was going, and her husband would soon be back; she used to write him letters—such long letters, all full of her talk about the baby, and his taking notice, and growing, and such like; but she didn't have many letters from him. 'You see, Jemima, he's always going from place to place,' she said; 'and then my letters lie at the post offices where I direct them, and half the time he doesn't receive them at all; so I can't wonder at not hearing very often from him;' she used to be so pleased, poor dear, when a letter did come, though I'm sure they were short enough, for I've seen her open them; but, ah! when the three months went by, and Mr. Lesley didn't come back, how dreadfully she did fret! always secretly, though, for she didn't seem to like that anybody should know her troubles, for fear they should blame him, the brute. 'He's going further north,' she told me; 'Germany's such a big country, you know, Jemima; and I'm afraid, from what Robert says, he thinks of going beyond Germany, to the capital of Russia perhaps. You see, it's necessary for him to travel in order to complete his education.' I couldn't help laughing outright at this; for I thought if Mr. Lesley wasn't educated enough with all his books, and colleges, and crackjaw languages, and such like, he never would be educated. However, that was no business of mine, and I keep my thoughts to myself. The time went by, and still there was no news of Mr. Lesley coming home. He was always going further and further north, she told me, when she spoke of him; but she'd got to talk of him very little now, though I know she was thinking of him and fretting about him all day and all night too; for I've slept with her sometimes, and heard her moan in her sleep, and speak his name, O so pitiful!"

"Poor girl! poor girl! she was little more than a child!" murmured Francis Tredethlyn.

"No more she was," answered Miss Banks, with energy; "and him as ill-treated her was a brute. I'm sure I never thought much of him, with his scornful, sneering ways, treating me and mother as if we was so much dirt under his feet. As for that poor young thing, it was a sorrowful day for her when she first set eyes upon him, fine gentleman though he was, and above her in station, which she was always telling me as a kind of excuse for his bad conduct. Well, sir, his letters got fewer and fewer, and still Susan kept her troubles to herself, and only said he was going further north, and that he would be back before the year was out. But the year passed, and he didn't come back, and he'd been away nearly ten months, and the baby was fourteen months old, when a letter came for Susan, with St. Petersburg on the post-mark

I never shall forget that day. It was dull, cold, March weather, with the wind howling and moaning enough to give the liveliest person the chills, and Mrs. Lesley had been sitting by the window all the afternoon watching for the postman. She was beginning to be nervous about her husband's health, she told me, as it was so long since she had heard from him. The postman came at last, and I was down-stairs with mother when he came. Mrs. Lesley ran into the passage and took the letter herself. We heard the parlor door shut, and then five minutes afterwards we heard a scream and a heavy fall. Me and mother rushed up-stairs, and there was poor Susan lying on the floor, with a letter clutched in her hand, and the fingers clenched upon it so that neither me nor mother could loosen them. We lifted her up and laid her on the sofa. She didn't seem to have fainted dead away, for she opened her eyes directly, and said, 'Oh, why didn't you let me lie there till I died?' And it was enough to pierce the hardest heart to hear her. Mother began talking about the troubles of the world, and asked her if there was bad news in the letter. 'Oh, yes!' she cried; 'cruel news—dreadful news!' And then mother asked her, 'Was Mr. Lesley dead?' 'Yes,' she said, 'dead to me! dead to me!' Mother fancied she meant he was really dead, and said she hoped Mrs. Lesley was left comfortably provided for. You see, having seen a deal of trouble herself, mother will look at things in that light. And then Susan cried out that her trouble was one that we could never understand. I couldn't bear to leave her; but I got mother out of the way—for her ways are apt to be wearing to any one that's in trouble—and I stopped with Susan all the evening. But she never spoke once; she only lay quite quiet upon the sofa, with her face turned to the wall; but I knew that she was crying all the time; and when I took her the baby, thinking the sight of him might comfort her, she only waved him away like, with her hand. I didn't leave her till twelve o'clock that night: but she was still lying on the sofa with her face turned to the wall. But just as I was going away she stretched out her hand and said, 'God bless you, Jemima, it is very good of you to stop with me, but there is nothing upon this wide earth that can give me any comfort now.' I didn't see her the next morning, for she went out very early, and took the baby with her, and she didn't come back till late at night, and then she came back without the baby. You might have knocked me down with a feather when I opened the door to her and saw her come in without the child. 'Oh, Susan,' I said, 'what have you done with Robert?'—he'd been christened Robert after his 'pa, and I'd stood godmother for him. Susan was as pale as death, but she said very quietly, 'I've put him out to nurse in the country, Jemima. I was obliged to part from him, for I'm going away.' I thought all in a moment that she was going abroad to her husband, and that her grief had been about parting with her child; but then I remembered what she'd said the night before, about Mr. Lesley being dead to her, and do what I would I couldn't make it out. I'm sure I was as much cut up at the thought of her going away as if she'd been my own sister."

OUR INTERIOR CORRESPONDENCE.

PLACERVILLE, April 4th, 1865.

IT was with considerable regret that I bade adieu to the mountain city of Nevada. It is undoubtedly one of the pleasiest mining towns that I have had the fortune to visit in my wanderings over this State. I believe in a former letter I spoke of the rich mineral wealth that nature had stored away in this section of the country. There are some leads here, which compare well with the representative rich mines of the State. Many men have reaped fortunes in a few months, and nowhere on this coast have prospecting parties more reason to be hopeful than in Nevada county. Not the least of the attractions of the town of Nevada is its hotel accommodations; the table set at the "Union" is by far the best that your itinerant correspondent has put his legs under since he left the Bay City. (This is written expressly for the attention of some hotels, which I will not mention.)

Leaving Nevada for Folsom in one of those delectable conveyances called a "stage," I underwent a process of thumping, shaking and upsetting that I never thought my constitution was elastic enough to go through without a complete letting down. But I managed to worry bravely through the infliction as far as Auburn, at which point the road decidedly improves.

Auburn is a dilapidated, ancient-looking town, seeming as if it were providentially dropped in its present place expressly to provide a stopping-place for the innumerable stages that pass through it. Scarcely any business is done in the place; nobody ever expects to do any, and the inhabitants generally pass their time in the most tedious of all occupations in life—doing nothing.

Newcastle I shall ever remember with feelings of gratitude for it was at that spot that I bade a temporary adieu to the stage, (I do not mean the stage where folks play, but the conveyance where passengers find riding to be the hardest of work,) and once more felt the delights of travelling like a Christian—by rail.

I had to stop at Folsom a couple of days, and was pleased enough not to have to stay there longer. It is almost as dull as Auburn, but they talk of starting two manufactories there soon, in which case the town will undoubtedly become a very important one in the Sacramento valley.

Latrobe is a collection of some half-dozen houses, and it is also the present terminus of the Sacramento Valley Railroad. Thence to Placerville we had eighteen more miles of staging. But this time I was destined to a most pleasant disappointment, for we found the road in excellent condition, and I arrived here without once having cause to let my "angry passions rise" or in any way impairing my delicate digestion. The country through which this road passes presents a beautiful picture. Here, the view embraces beautifully green, rich fields, relieved in the distance by thick groves of trees. There, a picturesque mountain road winds around some tall, bold eminence, the high, snow-clad peaks of the Sierras forming a pleasing contrast to the grass-covered tops of the smaller hills.

Not having had time as yet to prospect Placerville, I defer saying anything about it at present, but will make it the subject of future correspondence.

ROBIN HOOD.

P. S.—I was just directing this letter, when the glorious intelligence was received here of the capture of Richmond. Great is the excitement in town; much is the whisky that is drank; gorgeous is the bunting that is hung out, and tremendous is the amount of patriotism afloat. Bells are ringing, the militia is parading, boys are shouting, and guns are being fired. There never was such a terrific state of excitement known before in the quiet, staid city of Placerville. All business is suspended, and the inhabitants are bound to have a good time generally. It is stated that the news would have reached here early this morning, but that the telegraph operator at Folsom celebrated to such an extent that he forgot to send it further. While I write the noise outside in the street is deafening. Patriotism and whisky are on the rampage—especially whisky—and both are pardonable under the circumstances.

THE "FASHION."—"As well be out of the world as out of the fashion," says an old proverb, and so Messrs. Porter & Covey seem to have thought when they consolidated their fortunes and took possession of the Fashion stables on Sutter street, between Montgomery and Sansome. No one can pass the building without being attracted by the appearance of its front, for it is—like life—checkered. The interior reveals a view of decidedly the best and most completely-arranged stables in the city, probably one of the best on the continent. It has almost as many stories as one of our first class hotels, and the horses have rooms on nearly every floor, those that live in the sky parlors paying no more for board than those occupying the basement. To the majority of stables, the Fashion, in its interior economy and appointments, presents about the same contrast that the Occidental offers to most hotels. Buggies, robes, harness and horses, one must needs be fastidious, indeed, if he cannot find a turn-out to suit his fancy there. "Podgers," in a private letter, writes that he often wishes for a pair of Porter & Covey's nags on the Bloomingdale, as they do not furnish such teams on livery in New York. It was from their establishment the team came that brought three gentlemen in from the Cliff House in a short twenty-four minutes some time since. The character of all horse men is by no means above suspicion, and the fraternity, owing to the laxity of moral principle exhibited by some unworthy members, has won a not altogether enviable reputation, but it is safe enough to bet on either Porter or Covey—for they are both family men and have something more than individual reputations to lose.

WHERE TO BUY FLOWERS.—We take great pleasure in directing the attention of our readers to the establishment of C. B. Miller, Florist, 206 Bush street, whose advertisement appears in another column. Mr. Miller roams the cultivation of flowers his pleasure and study at the East before the embarrassments which the present war brought to so many induced him to adopt it as a profession. We have often observed that less taste is shown in the arrangement of bouquets by the venders here, than in almost any other city in the world. A flower-girl in Paris will tie you a bunch of violets or roses with a taste that makes them precious to the eye; but here the crowding together of staring colors and the production of a wad that can be seen or scented a block off, with no regard to the harmony and contrast of tints, and a total absence of consideration for the eye which craves an occasional sprig or leaf of green, seems the only object aimed at. Mr. Miller, however, arranges his floral favors in a most tasteful manner; withal he discourses most intelligently upon the theme that is nearest his heart—sometimes in THE CALIFORNIAN—and we take special pleasure in introducing so deserving a gentleman to the kindly patronage of our readers.

Private Frank Williams, of Company G, Eighth Regiment, while assisting in firing a salute at Alcatraz, Thursday, was instantly killed by the premature discharge of a cannon.

MY SOJOURN IN SILVER LAND.

SAN FRANCISCO, April 3, 1865.

MY DEAR INIGO.—I am once more at home, and have congratulated myself a great many times that such is the case, though, strange as it may appear, (after grumbling in the way I did,) I was beginning to like Virginia City and its surroundings. However, women are allowed to change their minds. Poor things! that is one of their few privileges.

After the first few days of my sojourn in Virginia the mind dried up a little, and it was possible to walk out if you did not mind going over the tops of your boots. One gets used to everything, they say—even to having remarks passed on one's understandings, more particularly if they are not disparaging remarks; and as there are not quite so many women in Virginia City as in San Francisco, the men cannot afford to criticize severely, so I "passed muster" very well.

I went "prospecting" a little on my own account, and gained lots of information; in fact, I was instructed in the way of making "several" fortunes. I was strongly reminded of a story told me once by a friend who had been staying for some days in Acapulco. While there, he was mysteriously approached one day by a seedy-looking individual who wanted the loan of a few dollars, and who informed him that he could show him where there was a quantity of treasure buried—it was under a part of the old ruined church (which I presume you remember); he went on to describe how one had to go down seven steps and then count seven more, and turn to the left, etc., and there he would find diamonds, rubies, emeralds, and, as they say in Ireland, "gold galore." All this had been confided to the seedy-looking individual's grandmother, or some other elderly feminine, by a Spanish non, on her deathbed. "But," said my friend, "why don't you go and get it yourself?" "So I would," said the seedy individual, "but I should have to get a permit from the Government to be allowed to make my researches, and as my wife is sick in New York, I am obliged to go away on the next steamer, to see her." However, to return to my prospecting:

I did not climb Mount Davidson. Two or three people who had, told me it was not worth the trouble—that it did not give them "a sensation" (except in their knees;) but I climbed to the top of the Ophir grade, where I met with two or three parties of Indians. Some of them were dressed in a very remarkable manner; one I noticed particularly, and I will endeavor to describe his costume, so that when the next fancy ball takes place at the Cosmopolitan, (which John Henning solemnly promises is to be when the new building is finished,) you may not be at a loss for a costume, as I think you told me you were at the last ball. To begin, then:

One red morocco slipper, with Scotch stocking;
One top boot;
Corduroy (not white satin) breeches;
Scarlet military coat, with one sleeve;
Striped flannel undershirt;
Stovepipe hat, (black,) decorated with red and green feathers.

I assure you the effect was splendid, and the wearer looked as if he thought so. The costume of the ladies (what there was of it) was equally unique, but I cannot undertake a description of it. The whole set of them came chattering round us. What they wished to say it was impossible to make out. They seemed to take a great interest in me; my companion said he could not account for it, unless by supposing it was because I am fat, and they thought I should be good to eat.

From the top of the Ophir grade we had a splendid view of the country. At our feet lay Gold Hill, American Flat, and Silver city—all life and animation: quartz mills crushing out fabulous amounts of silver; mines "dumping" out rock to give, when crushed, at least five hundred dollars per ton; wonderful mule teams sticking fast in the mud, and the unfortunate mules having to be pulled out by any charitable person who happens to be "around" and will assist the driver, who, poor fellow, gets worn out, and feels almost like "sticking" himself. Notwithstanding that there is, I am told, a great deal of silver in the mud, it is not any the more pleasant to be held fast in. Should they build a railroad to the Truckee river, so that the quartz mills can be worked by water-power and rock crushed for less than half the expense it now is, perhaps somebody will collect the mud out of the streets for the sake of the silver in it, and we shall have no more silver pavements, which certainly are not desirable when in a liquid state.

I scrambled down a ravine from the Ophir grade, and inspected a great many "claims." I saw "Gentle Annie" reclining on the side of the hill, and "Mary Ann" coquetting with Uncle Sam and Overman at the foot, and I sat down on a flume by the Caledonia tunnel, and had a long conversation with a very intelligent Scotchman I found there. I am led to believe, from the information I received generally, that every "claim" has three ledges, and that they will all begin to take out "pay rock" in a day or two. There is no doubt that every one of them is "on the Comstock ledge," which must branch out in at least a hundred different directions. I located a little "claim" myself, and am confident that the Comstock runs clear through it. I would offer you an interest in it, but I think you object to assessments. The President of one of the companies said to me the other day: "Stockholders are so unreasonable; after they have paid assessments for a year or two, they begin to wonder if they are ever to get a dividend." Sordid wretches! I assure you he explained the whole system in such a persuasive way that I have almost made up my mind to pay another assessment on my "Josephine," which I see is called for, though the stock is only selling at fifty cents. Presidents and Superintendents must live, and they cannot be expected to undertake such arduous situations (where they actually have to go into a dirty mine, six or seven hundred feet under ground, two or three times in a year) without being allowed fast horses, plenty of champagne and all the other little et cetera of genteel life.

There were affectionate inquiries made about INIGO by several ladies of Virginia City, among others by the beautiful "Rowena," of the Cosmopolitan Ball, who certainly has not lost any of the beauty or grace for which she was so much admired while in San Francisco. She complained that the CALIFORNIANS in Virginia City generally were gone before she could get hold of one, so I said to her exactly what you would have said yourself: I had no doubt that THE CALIFORNIAN, or "any other man," would be happy to throw himself at her feet, if he thought she wished it. And now, Mr. INIGO, why do you not send a thousand CALIFORNIANS to Virginia City? Is the package already as heavy a one as can be "toted" over the mountains?

I did not return by the Pioneer route, as I had intended. I was deluded into going over the German Level by the promise of sixty miles of "splendid sleighing," because "it had been freezing hard the day before." The "splendid sleighing," however, brought to my memory the old Runic chapter, one verse of which says: "Trust not to the ice of one day's freezing; neither to the serpent who lies asleep; nor to the caresses of her you are going to marry; nor to a sword that is cracked or broken; nor to the son of a powerful man; nor to a field that is newly sown." I give you the whole verse because, as I have proved the first sentence to be good advice, possibly the same may be said of all the rest.

The snow not being sufficiently frozen, the horses could not keep their feet; and when they were down they could not help themselves, the snow was so deep. The drivers, poor fellows, seemed to be made of patience, for they never complained, though they had to get down in some parts of the road every few minutes, either to dig out the sleigh or pick up the horses.

We reached the Sierra Nevada as the sun was setting in colors of green and gold, blue and crimson, so gorgeous that it is impossible to describe its beauty. We rested awhile, and looked around. We saw a vast chain of snow mountains, looking like wave upon wave of an immense sea that had been suddenly frozen. These snow mountains are to me enchanted ground; the whispering of the wind through the pine trees seems like a thousand voices; the very trees themselves, one almost fancies, may have been bands of warriors rushing forward to bar our progress, changed to their present form by the wand of some powerful magician, and capable of being restored to their original shapes at any moment. Like the Norsemen, I almost believed in the race of the Frost giants, and wondered which of those tall pine trees represented Ymir, from whom the legends say this race descended, and where was the —"snow-skating Skadi,

Who dwells there, I trow,
In her father's old mansion."

After travelling over these mountains one can readily imagine there may be some foundation for the old Scandinavian tales of travellers going over the hills and yielding to a strange fascination, which induced them to wish to penetrate the interior, and, getting in, being enchanted and remaining there, like "Proud Margaret," whose story used to delight me years ago. Some few verses I remember still:

"Proud Margaret slept in at the door of the hill—
Time with me goes slow—
And the hill-king salutes her with eyes joyful;
But that grief is heavy, I know."

"And one brought out a filled-up horn—
Time with me goes slow—
Another put in a gilded corn;
But that grief is heavy, I know."

"The first drink she drank out of the horn—
Time with me goes slow—
She forgot straightway both heaven and earth;
But that grief is heavy, I know."

"The second drink she drank out of the horn—
Time with me goes slow—
She forgot straightway both God and his word;
But that grief is heavy, I know."

"The third drink she drank out of the horn—
Time with me goes slow—
She forgot straightway both sister and brother;
But that grief is heavy, I know."

I think there are about fifty verses relating "Proud Margaret's" adventures, all of which seem possible after sleighing over the Sierra Nevada. Our sleighing, however, came to an untimely end ten miles before reaching Dutch Flat, and we betook ourselves to the mud wagons. During these ten miles I privately made many vows that if I ever did get home I would not pay a visit to Washoe again for the next ten years, certain; but all this feeling soon wears off, and I should not mind starting again to-morrow!

Just before changing from the sleigh to the mud wagon, we met the "up train;" the road was so narrow that there was some difficulty in the sleighs passing each other, and we stopped for a few minutes. While there, the following conversation took place between the two drivers:

"Down" driver.—"Where's Charley? Have you heard anything of him?"

"Up" driver.—"Oh yes, he's behind, coming along slowly. He's got a lot of women."

"Down" driver.—"O Lord! just the worst kind of a lot he could possibly have."

Here there was a great "guffaw" among the male passengers of both sleighs. I thought this was cruel on the part of the driver, because none of the ladies (we had four) had complained during the whole trip, and, for anything he knew to the contrary, we were models of courage and patience. We had profited by the experience of an acquaintance who once undertook to remonstrate with Hank Monk, as she said, "in the civillest manner possible." In recounting it she told us, "All I said was: 'Please, good gentleman driver, don't go so fast; I am one of the biggest cowards in all creation!' but he only replied: 'Don't you think my life is as valuable to me as yours is to you?' and went on faster than ever. I declare," she concluded, shuddering, "my bones crack, even now, when I think of it."

At Dutch Flat we left one of our gentleman passengers, who said he had "had enough of it for the present," and again went on our way. Outside the town for about a mile, the gentlemen were obliged to walk through the mud. One individual, however, of the Jewish persuasion, declined, alleging he would get a "sore throat." I may here remark that this person invariably hid himself under his wife's shawl when there was any walking to be done, though at other times, and in the eating and drinking line, he seemed lively enough. It is strange that in stage travelling, there is always one disagreeable passenger. "Such is life," I suppose.

The road, in consequence of the thaw, was very bad until we reached Illinoistown, where we were to breakfast. However, there was no breakfast ready, and all the people of the house rushed at once into the kitchen and began to fry and frizzle. Just as they had concluded their labors the driver called, "All aboard!" and we had to scramble into the wagon without breakfast. Out rushed landlord, landlady and daughter, in a state of freuzy. "Why did you let us get breakfast when you wasn't a going to stop?" shrieked the old lady. "Yes, why did you?" echoed her spouse, "It's a shame, so it is," said the young one; and they all joined in a chorus of "Shame." All the response they got from the driver was "all aboard," and an "aside" for the benefit of the passengers of "I'm determined to teach that old woman to have breakfast ready at a proper time." We left the trio standing on the piazza, with indignation strongly depicted on their countenances, but we left no sympathy with them, for they gave us a wretched dinner when we passed through on our way up to Virginia.

The mud had dried up and the roads now were only rough. We had to catch the railroad so as not to miss the Sacramento boat, or, as it was Saturday, we should have had to lie over until Monday. I have no hesitation in saying here that I experienced some of the "tallest" driving that it has ever been my lot to witness. I certainly survived that experience, but I have not yet got over the effects of it. Still, it was splendid; we had to "make time," and, as the driver remarked to an enquiring passenger, "couldn't do it if we went slow." "If you want to miss the boat," he continued, "say the word;" but nobody did "say the word," and away we went "over bank, bush and scare." The course of Young Lochinvar, I am convinced, is not to be mentioned with ours. Fallen trees were not a circumstance—we went over them; where there were bridges, we patronized them; where there were none, we went through the creeks. A few boulders, more or less, were of no consequence, and I am under the impression that we went over one ox team. I am sure I caught a "bird's-eye view" of the horns of the oxen. Up hill and down dale we sped; I don't think the gates of the "what's-his-name place" would have "prevailed against us" if they had happened to be in our way. Dogs barked, and children yelled as we flew through the villages, but, like the "Wild Huntsman," we never paused in our mad career. At length the railroad station was in sight and we found we had "made time."

I have no doubt that Hank Mouk is a great driver, and I mean to pay him a visit one of these days; but I feel quite certain he cannot beat Nelson McDonald, who, I think, might be safely "backed" to drive one the world over, without upsetting, or allowing any obstacles to bar his progress. I should be quite willing to trust myself with him were I obliged to undertake such a journey, feeling that somehow I should come out safe in the end. After such an exciting ride the railroad seemed very flat and stupid, and I felt weary of it long before we got to Sacramento. As soon as we reached the boat I got a comfortable state-room, and at once consigned myself to the arms of Morpheus. If anything happened on the way down worth recording I am unable to record it, for I slept soundly the whole trip. I do not think that the Occidental baby, who used to keep all the boarders awake, could have aroused me from my peaceful slumbers. On reaching San Francisco I managed, however, to tumble myself into a carriage, which conveyed me to my comfortable quarters at the Cosmopolitan, where, (like the fat boy in Pickwick.) I fell fast asleep again. When I did get fairly awake and went out, I thought San Francisco seemed stupid. Montgomery street did not have half the charm of U street, for all the latter's mud and shabby drygoods stores, and I almost wished myself back in Virginia City. Perhaps the mountain fairies have cast a spell on me; so that you need not feel surprised if you hear of my returning to Virginia very soon.

LOCAL MATTERS.

The bridge from Steamboat Point to the Potrero Nuevo will be completed and open for travel within four weeks.

The will of J. B. Bayerque, deceased, late of Pioche, Bayerque & Co., has been admitted to probate. The estate is estimated at $50,000.

Pacific Engine Company, No. 8, appropriated $25 to aid the St. Andrew's Society of this city in prosecuting the officers of the Great Republic for "their brutal and cruel treatment of the crew of said ship."

A young son of Thomas E. Byrnes, residing at the corner of Fourth and Jessie streets, was riding on a heavily-loaded wool cart, April 1st, when he fell off and was run over by the truck, injuring him so severely as to cause death in a short time. The lad was an only child, and the sympathy elicited for the bereaved parents found expression in a very large attendance at the funeral of their loved one.

Owen Mullen, a soldier, killed his brother's wife, Mrs. Johanna Mullen, a few days since. The act was alleged to have been accidental, but some of the attendant circumstances led to a suspicion that it was a case of murder with deliberation and malice. Judge Shepherd held Mullen to answer before the County Court. Bail fixed at $2,500.

Jeremiah Donahue, of Alvarado, Alameda county, went to the law office of Messrs. Casserly & Barnes, on Tuesday afternoon, to transact some business, and after a short time suddenly complained of indisposition. He received medical attention at once, but without avail. He died in about twenty minutes at the office.

The Library Rooms of the Mechanics' Institute, having been rendered more attractive by rearrangement and such additions to the library as recent acquisitions have placed at the command of the Directors, were again opened to visitors on Thursday. The officers of the Institute are making every exertion to render the society worthy of popular support. If their labors are properly appreciated by those for whose benefit the Institute was organized, there will soon be a great increase in the membership.

An immense meeting, at the call of the Christian Commission, was held at Platt's Hall, Thursday evening; the object being to demonstrate not only the gratification for recent victories but to give a substantial token of sympathy for those who have been wounded in achieving them. Speeches were made by Mayor Coon, Revs. C. P. Lyford and M. C. Briggs, W. H. L. Barnes and Frank Pixley. At the conclusion of the meeting the sum of $2,120 85 was collected. $5,626 had been obtained during the day, making a total of $7,746 85.

The model of a patent self-acting wagon-brake, invented by M. K. Lewis, of Iowa, has been introduced to the attention of citizens recently. The brake is connected with the wagon-tongue, and whenever the team resists the momentum of the wagon, the wheels are at once locked by eccentric cams which are turned against them. The idea is so simple, and the brake so effectual, that in looking at the model the only wonder is that it had not been thought of long ago. It will undoubtedly prove of great utility on the mountain roads of California, where the skill, patience and profanity of teamsters are sufficiently exercised without having to "mind the brakes."

GRAND CREDIT SALE OF HOMESTEAD LOTS.—Messrs. Cobb & Sinton, will sell on Saturday, April 22d, four hundred homestead lots on the most liberal credit, situated adjacent to the Willows and adjoining the property of the San Francisco and Eureka Homestead Associations. The Folsom street cars land passengers within a few hundred feet of this property. The title is United States Patent, and is therefore unquestionable. This sale will present an opportunity seldom offered to procure homesteads on liberal credit terms. Maps can be had of Cobb & Sinton, No. 406 Montgomery street.

A HEALTH.

I fill this cup to one made up
Of loveliness alone,
A woman, of her gentle sex
The seeming paragon;
To whom the better elements
And kindly stars have given
A form so fair, that, like the air
'Tis less of earth than heaven.

Her every tone is music's own,
Like those of morning-birds,
And something more than melody
Dwells ever in her words;
The coinage of her heart are they,
And from her lips each flows
As one may see the burden'd bee
Forth issue from the rose.

Affections are as thoughts to her,
The measures of her hours;
Her feelings have the fragrance,
The freshness of young flowers;
And lovely passions, changing oft,
So fill her, she appears
The image of themselves by turns—
The idol of past years!

Of her bright face one glance will trace
A picture on the brain,
And of her voice in echoing hearts
A sound must long remain:
But memory, such as mine of her,
So very much endears,
When death is nigh my latest sigh
Will not be life's, but hers.

I fill'd this cup to one made up
Of loveliness alone,
A woman, of her gentle sex
The seeming paragon—
Her health! and would on earth there stood
Some more of such a frame,
That life might be all poetry,
And weariness a name.

THE COLONEL'S VALENTINE, AND ITS FATE.

CHAPTER I.

UP IN THE CLOUDS.

"I NEVER was guilty of such a thing in my life," said the Colonel, calmly.

"Never sent a valentine?"

"Never."

"Nor received one?"

"No."

"Benighted ignorance! Here is a man to whom the most pleasing emotions are unknown; whose heart has never been wrung by the sight of its fac-simile pierced with a barbed shaft, or softened with a delicious couplet wrapped in roses! I'll tell my cousin Mary. Miss Arundel, here is a full-grown man who never sent or received a valentine."

Now, if any one had been attentively observing him, they might have detected a slight change in the indolent composure of the Colonel's handsome features. His negligent posture became the least bit more upright, and a glance from under his sleepy eyelids towards the lady addressed as Miss Arundel, might have aroused in that same attentive observer some little of the interest of speculation. That is, if the attentive observer had been at hand; which he wasn't.

Colonel Hugh Carton had been leaning carelessly over the back of a couch on which lounged his friend and inquisitor, Francis Graham, the boyish son of the Colonel's present host. And if Col. Carton had been asked some ten days ago what he thought about country visits in general, he would probably have answered with a shrug. "Bored!" His opinion had undergone modification by this time, however. Perhaps the Grahams were singularly felicitous in the party of guests they contrived to draw together; perhaps ten days of such glorious weather as rarely falls to the lot of February's infancy had something to do with the complacent state of his mind. At any rate, when young Graham appealed to Miss Arundel, there was in Col. Carton's momentary emotion a small stir of regret that this was the last evening of his stay. The young lady was occupied with one of those never-ending resources, the photographic albums, and she did not look up to answer her cousin's speech. It could not possibly matter to her about Col. Carton and his valentines.

"What a noise you are making, Frank!" she said. "You drown the music."

"Music!" echoed Frank. "A dissipated entreaty to 'Take this cup of sparkling wine.' You know I ought not to listen to that, Mary. And it makes my flesh creep, and turns you all into water-nymphs and gnomes. No. Whose caricatures have you got there?"

"I have got Titians as Margaret," replied Miss Arundel, quietly, faithful to her book.

"Somebody dressed up to resemble her, you mean?" said Frank.

He made one or two more efforts to draw his cousin into what he called conversation, failed, gave it up, hid a yawn with some difficulty, and snatched away. Those two were hopelessly stupid; the one as bad as the other: and suddenly something seemed to flash upon Mr. Frank, and he exclaimed. "By George!" and looked back; but the relative positions were just as he had left them.

It might have been supposed that the Colonel, thus left free, would naturally join the young lady in her examination of Titians as Margaret; but he did not. He only altered his position by leaning against a dark background of curtain, so as to be able to take in the whole room, with all its arrangements a glance. Certainly his hostess was a woman of tact. The general fault in these country-house assemblages was, he considered, that the guests were too much en masse; too gregarious. Now, here and there, in Mrs. Graham's drawing-room, small tables were dotted about, admirably placed, and admitting of games for two only, apart from the rest, without being positively isolated—tables at which delightful little flirtations could and did go on with the most comfortable freedom from disturbance. Some one or two of these caught the Colonel's eye in its glance round the room, and he smiled to himself slightly. It is to be feared that he had a disposition to be cynical about them. He never flirted himself; it was an amusement that had no charm for him; but he thought this a very clever plan for parcelling off sundry pairs out of the mass of guests, and making them amuse themselves—and others who chose to look on. Then his eyes came back to Miss Arundel over her book. They rested there with a strange expression for a moment, and then dropped. Other people, perhaps, would have seen little beauty in the face, except the beauty inseparable—in a degree at least—from youth. But Col. Carton did not see as other people did. He was up in the clouds about Mary Arundel; up in the clouds for the first time in his life. All that was most exalted; all that he would have been sceptical about a fortnight ago, tinted his thoughts of her. He threw the light of stars about her till it dazzled him. He fancied—see how visionary the practical man grows when he is touched—he fancied that, little as he sought her, they were yet together in perpetual, half-conscious thought of each other, and reference to each other's judgment. But his visit was over, and could not be prolonged. He did not yet know whether he meant to go away, having kept silence, or not.

Perhaps this uncertainty was a charm in itself; he could not tell. By-and-by, when the music began again, he left his leaning posture and approached Mary's table.

"It is a pity that pleasant things should come to an end," said the Colonel, out of his cloud.

From any one else such a commencement as this, by an abstract proposition, might have made her laugh; but somehow the Colonel had got into a habit of speaking to her out of his half-finished reveries, and she was used to it.

"I don't know," responded Mary. "They say that pleasure itself would cease to be pleasant, if it had no end."

The Colonel meditated.

"That applies to the present only; I mean to this life," he said.

Mary did not answer. There was such an odd mixture of grave thoughts with lighter ones in this man's talk, that he perplexed her. Just now, however, he seemed to rouse himself all once. If he meant to speak out, there was no time for wandering off into foreign discussion.

"I never thought to close a visit such as this with so much regret," he said. "I am obliged to leave here to-morrow. You go also, I think?"

"Yes, I must be at home for my sister's wedding. It is fixed for the 14th."

The Colonel grew a shade paler, as he looked down upon the face that was never raised to his.

"If I thought—" he began slowly.

He never finished. The voice of his restless friend broke in upon him, and he stopped. He never did anything in a hurry.

"Valentine's Day," said Frank, catching his cousin's speech, and innocently unconscious that he could have been spared. "A very proper day, too. Now, Mary, confess; haven't you a weakness for valentines?"

"No, Frank."

"Carton," said Frank, solemnly, "she is afraid of you and won't owe it. Valentine's Day has never passed yet without bringing her a cargo of what she affects to despise."

Mary laughed.

"And very amusing it is; especially when I get an original lyric from Francis Graham. You know, Frank—"

"Ch—ut! Don't add libel to your other crimes. Carton, when we wore pinafores, Mary promised to be faithful to me forever. I would have kept my pact and waited for her—I mean, allowed her to wait for me," said Frank, twinkling his eyes; "but you see how it is. A wiser man than I am condemns valentines, and my poor annual offering is rejected."

Mary answered quickly, a little displeased:

"Frank, you carry your nonsense too far. Of course, I am very fond of valentines, and you can send me as many as you like. Real ones," she added, trying to speak lightly;

"all done up in a beautiful lace envelope, with 'To my Valentine' illuminated outside."

Mary stopped. There was a movement in the room which she understood, and she rose, not altogether sorry to get away.

"I shall remember," said the Colonel, turning to her. And then he added: "I'm afraid I shall not see you to-morrow; I start early. Good night, and good by."

He might have held her hand a little longer than was usual or necessary; perhaps he did.

But Mary went through the other "Good nights" with perfect calmness, and no one was sufficiently interested in her to notice that her eyes were very bright and her cheeks had more pink in them than usual. And the Colonel changed his dress and went to the smoking-room, after his habit; but he did not stay there long, and he was very silent. In the early morning, Frank Graham volunteered to accompany his friend for a mile or two. I dare say the Colonel could have dispensed with the courtesy; but he did not say so, acquiescing simply.

As he rode away, Colonel Carton turned his head, and looked slowly up along the range of windows which still had their white blinds down. It is just possible that this wistful backward look was seen, but that is Mary's business, not ours.

CHAPTER II.

HAUNTED.

Colonel Carton was in town; a lonely, meditative man. He had spent a whole dull month in town. He had sauntered through club-rooms, comparatively empty; he had acquired secret, and probably lying information, respecting the opera for the forthcoming season; he had read political articles till he was choked with politics, and found himself holding an inquest on poor dead Poland in his broken sleep. He had gone about from place to place aimlessly, with a weight on his mind, and a vague belief that there was a flaw somewhere in the government of the universe, but where it was he could not tell. For when Colonel Carton rode away from the Graham's "place in the country," I don't think he ever contemplated the possibility that this thing which had happened to him would happen. The Colonel had never sent a valentine in his life before; he sent one then. It was not a string of mild rhymes of his own putting together; nor a purchased and printed piece of insane sweetness. It is true that he, who did nothing by halves, bethought him of the lace envelope which Mary had spoken of. She was jesting, of course; but she should have one. I don't know how many respectable deniers in such fancy goods hated the Colonel for his hardness to please; and I should be afraid to chronicle the price at which he finally secured a single envelope of the most delicate elaboration of design and finish. And on the outside of this he wrote gravely "To my Valentine." There might have been a comical sort of dismay in his face as he looked at the sentence; but he was not ashamed of it: he was too much in earnest. Whatever it looked like to others, it meant for him, "To my wife—if she will have me."

He could not have borne, of course, that indifferent eyes should see that dainty envelope and know it for his. But no one was to see it—that is, no one but Mary. And then he had written his letter, and the light of stars got into it and filled it. He came down out of his cloud to write; solemnly in earnest. The tender words which made their escape, somehow, from his unaccustomed pen, gave him so odd a sensation when he saw them, that he was fain to lay his hand over the page and hide them from his own eyes as he went on.

What a fool he was!

This he would have said now; for this valentine, which had grown under his hands into an almost sacred thing, never was answered.

Colonel Carton was not a conceited man; but he had a certain proper amount of pride. What had this girl seen in him that she should not only mock him first with an affectation of interest, but absolutely receive his proposal with an insulting silence?

He might not be worthy of her, perhaps; but he was her equal in society's eyes; and, at any rate, an honest man's offer of his heart and home and faithful devotion is at least worth a reply. The Colonel's pale face used to flush a little at those times when he was turning this over in his mind; indeed it might be difficult to say when he was not turning it over in some indirect fashion. He would not have told the episode to his dearest friend—by the way, I doubt whether he had a dearest friend; if he had, that same friend kept strangely aloof from him now. The Colonel had few likings; his heart would have been all his wife's, if—

Well, it was of no use to think any more about it. And, having come to that conclusion, the Colonel would deliberately begin again, and go over all the details of that visit which had been so precious to him.

By-and-by, however, the Queen's speech having gone the round of the papers, and become a thing of the past, people began to come up to town, and the season came in.

Colonel Carton went to the Opera a good deal, for the sake of the music; which was very simple and childish of him.

but he didn't care for that. He rode also, as other men did; in fact he lived outwardly as though nothing strange had befallen him; but he was not content. He began to have fits of moralizing about life and its purposes; he began to feel terribly weary and oppressed with all the tramp and bustle of Carlyle's worn-out world; above all, and at all times, he was haunted.

Once, as he stood staring absently at the carriages, closely packed together in the grand drive, something came flapping at the Colonel's heart and awakened him. It was only a face; a young face in a bonnet, looking out towards him from one of those carriages, but with no recognition in it. He had a momentary doubt, indeed, whether it was anything more real than the spectre which always haunted him; but the doubt was only momentary. Some one said near him that the Queen was coming; but Colonel Carton did not wait to see her Majesty: he turned and went away heavily. He took himself to task for his folly, and tried to fling upon it a bit of his old cynicism. He was very angry with himself indeed. For several days he tried a faster life than was usual with him: it disgusted his fastidious taste, and he gave it up. Once again he was destined to come into indirect contact with the woman who had injured him. He was in the strangers' gallery of the "House," and some one tapped him on the shoulder, greeting him with effusion. It was young Francis Graham.

"How are you, old fellow? Jolly slow, isn't it?"

And then he made a gesture in the direction of the curious-looking cradle which is called the ladies gallery.

"Mary Arundel is there, with Lady Temple—her sister, you know. Married Temple, the Member, last February."

The Colonel made no movement at all, but kept on looking straight before him. A little fit of impatience seized him. Was he never to get rid of her? Never to be able to hear her name, or think of her, without this strange tumult of agitation? It would be better to leave England at once, he thought. And then he began to wonder, in a desultory fashion, what she thought of it all? Was she merry, like she used to be? Did she enjoy all the gaieties of a town season, with her conscience untroubled?

Perhaps it would have given him a dreary sort of satisfaction if he could have known that Mary was not particularly merry or gay; that it was all dull work, stale and unprofitable; that the chatter of her companions, when they retired to that little sanetum where the rattle of teacups sounded so inviting, fell on her ear like the buzzing of insects, intolerably monotonous. But the Colonel could not know this; and if he had, he could not have understood why it was so. He waved off Frank's invitation to the place in the country for the autumn; he didn't think he cared about shooting, much. In fact, his plans were undecided; probably he should go to Switzerland, or to Rome; perhaps on to Jerusalem.

CHAPTER III.

LADY TEMPLE'S DESK.

"Let me come in a bit, Carton. What an awful time it is since you were here!"

"Just two years," replied the Colonel, thoughtfully. "I hadn't this room then."

Frank Graham laughed, and made a grimace at the superfluity of looking-glass which surrounded him.

"No: you may get a view of yourself in any position you like. I don't know why you were put here; one of the mysteries of domestic polity, I suppose."

The Colonel shivered slightly, as a blast of wind sounded round the house and finished up with a dismal moan at the window.

"The fire is comfortable," he said. "If I recollect rightly, it's different weather from that we had this time two years. Many people here, Frank?"

"Well—yes; pretty fair. You know most of them. The Temples are here; the governor wanted Sir John to quarrel with about some bill or another. And Mary Arundel is with them. Carton, don't be angry with a fellow; but, do you know, I used to fancy—"

"There's just fifteen minutes to dress in," said the Colonel, rising with his usual deliberation; "and I don't know that I can do it, so—"

"In polite language, I'm to 'take and hook it,' eh? Well, I'll not hinder such a get-up as yours. By-by."

Colonel Carton gave exactly five out of the fifteen minutes remaining to meditation; which did him very little service. So he would have to meet her again. How? He tried to settle this question, and failed. After all, it did not depend entirely upon himself; it was as well, perhaps, to leave it to chance.

He was down in excellent time, notwithstanding the wasted five minutes; and it fell to his lot to take Miss Arundel in to dinner.

I don't suppose that a more taciturn couple ever descended a staircase together. The Colonel had renewed his acquaintance with Miss Arundel indeed, but with the most inimitable distance and gravity. No one, seeing them meet, would have suspected the existence of those past passages in their lives which once drew them so closely together. And the Colonel did not think it necessary to make conversation either. Beyond the barest civilities, he said nothing, and seemed quite content that Mary's attention should be wholly engrossed by her other neighbor.

That night the Colonel played chess with Lady Temple at one of the convenient little tables before mentioned. It was rather a silent game, so that they could not have made much progress towards intimacy by means of words; neither can I tell how it was that before he checkmated her the Colonel caught himself speaking to Lady Temple with his old peculiar mixture of frankness and reserved accorded only to his friends, while she listened to him, and answered him too, as though they had known each other from childhood instead of having met for the first time an hour or two ago. The psychologist might resolve it into a simple question of natural affinities; at any rate, whatever the cause, the result is certain, that these two sought each other out from the first night of their meeting as old friends might have done.

"My sister is going to sing," said Lady Temple, one evening, as the pieces were placed. "I'm afraid this will be a poor game, for I always listen to Mary. You have heard her?"

"No," the Colonel was not aware that Miss Arundel sang at all.

"Yet you must have met here once before, I think?"

"Yes."

"That is strange. Perhaps it was—ah, yes, I remember; singing was forbidden to her just then; she is never very strong. Do you play first?"

"Colonel Carton propelled the king's pawn into its accustomed square, and appeared to watch his adversary's move with interest."

"Miss Arundel is much quieter than she was two years ago. I remember that she was the life of all pleasure arrangements. If she is in delicate health, that explains it."

"Ask her," said Lady Temple, laughing. "She will tell you it's old age.—Mary is odd."

The Colonel looked at her ladyship's blonde face and fair hair speculatively. She must be at least five years younger than Mary, he thought. And then, with a finger on the piece he was about to move, he stopped. As a rule he did not care for amateur singing; people in the constant habit of hearing first rate professionals seldom do. But this was another thing, altogether different from the amateur singing of his experience. He kept his eyes on the board steadily, but Lady Temple saw that he was not thinking about the game.

"Suppose we give it up for a time?" said her ladyship.

He looked up quickly, with a slight smile.

"I beg your pardon, Lady Temple; not unless you wish it; I move the bishop."

Foolish play, as Lady Temple knew, and utterly foreign to his usual tactics; but she said nothing, and the Colonel lost the game in a few moves.

"For the first time!" said her ladyship, triumphantly: "we will not begin again to-night."

Colonel Carton acquiesced. Mary was still at the piano, and likely to remain there. When such assemblies as these get hold of a fine voice, there is very little merey shown to its owner. By-and-by the Colonel got restless, and went up again to Lady Temple.

"You said your sister was not strong. Won't she be tired?"

"Yes," said her ladyship; "I shall put a stop to it."

Perhaps she expected him to accompany her to the piano, but he did not; neither did he join the group of enthusiasts who loaded the singer with thanks and flattery. Mary and he were seldom near each other; when they were, it was as though they had both touched an iceberg, and never again could thaw into any degree of kindness or warmth. Yet still the Colonel stayed on. He had only come down for a day or two, but a week was gone already. He did not know how closely those keen eyes of young Graham's watched him, nor how perplexed the young man was with his behavior.

"They make love like crowned heads," said Frank; "that is, if it isn't all a sell; I never saw such stateliness between lovers."

But there was no love-making in the case; nothing at all like it.

And one evening Colonel Carton determined with himself that he had stayed too long already, and would positively take his departure the next morning. He was standing indolently in the doorway of the back drawing-room when he made this decision; and round the fire, in that cosiest of retreats, he saw Lady Temple and her sister, two or three other young ladies, and Frank Graham, all in some animated discussion—all, that is, except Mary. Her face was turned towards the fire, and the profile, which was all he saw, struck him with its expression of weary listlessness. Suddenly Mary turned and looked at him—a strange look, averted hastily in a moment, for she had not known that he was there. But the Colonel saw the quick rush of color over her face—saw her put up one hand to hide it, and felt desperately that he must go away, or once again he should be a fool.

"Carton!" cried Frank, darting up, and drawing him towards the group. "The very man I wanted. He never sent one in his life. I heard him boast about it in that very room. Isn't it a true bill, Carton? I've adopted your opinions. Bear witness with me that valentines are silly, childish, nonsensical, everything that's bad."

The Colonel, with a bitterness that the occasion did not seem to demand, replied:

"As mediums for inflicting pain and unwarrantable insult, I think them admirable, Frank."

Every one looked up at the Colonel as he said this. Even Frank began rashly: "Hallo, old fellow, I didn't think—" and then stopped, not knowing what to say. Lady Temple was the first to break the uneasy silence, which she did with an assumed indifference.

"Col. Carton judges them harshly. I have had many a laugh over mine before I was married. I don't get any now. I remember that the last I had was on my wedding morning, and I never opened it."

"Never opened it!" repeated Frank. "What a shame!"

"No. It wasn't likely I could attend to such matters then. When I took off the outside cover, and saw what it was, I threw it with a lot of old letters into my travelling desk, and there it is now for anything I know to the contrary. It's odd I never had the curiosity to look for it; suppose we have a search now? Frank, you may fetch the desk, if it isn't too heavy for you."

No one spoke while Lady Temple unlocked the travelling-desk, which looked too ponderous for a lady's use, and had papers in it suggestive of Sir John's big caligraphy. No one noticed the tall figure behind her chair; no one saw the lips compressed and white, the head bending lower and lower, and the long fingers pressing into each other as Lady Temple dived into the secret recesses of the desk. He saw it all now; all his blind stupidity, and what it had caused, flashed across him as Lady Temple held up the long-hidden envelope. Half a dozen small hands were stretched out eagerly for it; one, larger than these, suddenly pressed somewhat heavily on her ladyship's shoulder.

"Lady Temple, may I entreat of your goodness to restore to me that letter?"

"Colonel Carton!—to you?"

"To me. I sent that valentine; the only one I ever did or ever shall send. Lady Temple, on my honor it contains nothing that could offend you in any way. Another time I will explain fully; now, to my regret and remorse concerning it, grant my request."

Lady Temple did not hesitate a moment. Something in this man's agitated manner appealed to her too strongly, and once again the Colonel held in his hand the luckless envelope of elaborate design and finish, and looked down upon the address in his own writing: "To my Valentine."

"It strikes me that we are being selfish," said Lady Temple, shutting up the desk briskly. "Take it back, Frank, and, young ladies, follow me, if you please, into the drawing-room, where everybody is wondering why there is no music."

The Colonel stepped forward out of his corner. Did Mary know? Did she understand all, and forgive him?"

"Not you," said the Colonel, when she rose to go with the rest; "not you, quite yet. Surely my punishment has lasted long enough!"

They stood together on the hearth, and the Colonel held out the unhappy valentine above a tiny jet of flame.

"You know that it is your property," he said. "I never thought of your sister at all; never thought of any other Miss Arundel than you. How was I to know you were not the eldest?"

"If it is mine, give it to me, Colonel Carton."

"Presently. I asked you in it to be my wife, Mary; as you had a right to expect I should do. What could I think when I got no answer? Perhaps we have both misjudged each other?"

"Perhaps."

"Through this error? We have been dreadfully polite these few days," said the Colonel, with a comical ruefulness. "I couldn't have stood it any longer; I meant to go away to-morrow."

The Colonel paused. The light of stars began to shine about her again as he held out his hand.

"Mary, I would be very true and loving to you. Will you be my wife?"

Perhaps Mary was a little bit afraid of a scene just then, knowing that at any moment she might be summoned to the piano; and she was not strong. Her answer, when she did answer in words, was another question:

"Will you give me my valentine at last, and let me go?"

I think the Colonel was satisfied with it.

"BIRTH" and "DEATH" are words merely. "Chance" and "Change" define them. Even now I see the world recede; but I carry myself about with me wherever I am transported. Therefore hath memory her portion in my immortality.—Kimball.

QUIET thyself until time try the truth, and it may be thy fears will prove greater than thy misfortune.—Southwell.

THE CALIFORNIAN.

SAN FRANCISCO, SATURDAY, APRIL 8, 1865.

REMOVAL.—The publication office and editorial rooms of THE CALIFORNIAN are removed to 532 Merchant street, between Montgomery and Sansome.

VICTORY! VICTORY!!

RICHMOND has fallen; a profane presence has entered the parlor of the Confederacy, and the former occupants have left in disgust. It is the usual custom when persons leave the city with the intention of spending the summer in the country, to mention the probable time of their return, or at least leave their address, that they may be written to or called upon; but in the present instance the custom—at once a convenience and a courtesy—seems to have been neglected. Consequently we are as yet ignorant as to the destination of the tenants whose lease has been so suddenly raised, and cannot pronounce positively whether they purpose to spend the summer in the Carolinas or an eternity in the last ditch. Sultry as the climate of the Carolinas always is in the summer months, we have an idea that Sherman would contrive to make it slightly warmer for them than usual this season, though, as contrasted with the alternative of the last ditch, a sensible salamander would not hesitate for a moment in making a choice.

Whither the Confederates have gone, or where they will take up their next lines of defence, is a matter of speculation but not an affair of much moment. Lee and his armies are very much in the position of the prize-fighter in the ring knocked into his corner, and with a very small probability of being able to come to time. Under these circumstances it is little wonder that his backers look pale, while the stakeholders lay their heads together to settle preliminaries in anticipation of a speedy throwing up of the sponge.

It is but reasonable to write that the end of the rebellion is near at hand. True, the rebel army is as yet uncaptured, but the staggering blow has been dealt. Its bulk is nearly as great as ever, but so is that of the bear through whose spine a rifle bullet has been sent. In the capture of Richmond a point necessarily vital may not have been struck, but from the nervous shock inflicted we have an idea that the rebellion cannot recover. Prestige is gone from the generals that in the beginning of the war were almost uniformly victorious, the faith of the rebels in their oracle is extinguished with the desertion of the shrine. Hemmed in and surrounded on all sides, they look vainly around for a place of refuge or a point where a successful stand can be made; and even to the restless proud spirits who originated the rebellion, and thus far have guided it, it must now be plain that a further prosecution of their efforts is useless, that a prolongation of the struggle can prove only a concession to pride at the expense of human life, and the probabilities are that they will consent to sacrifice their ambition and assume a position of comparative humiliation sooner than to further swell the sea of blood, whose crimson waves have already deluged the land. Every important strategic point which the limits of the Confederacy furnish is already in our possession; their source of supplies are cut off, the doors of the coast are shut and locked in the face of the foreign powers that so long slipped secretly in to their assistance with clothing and the munitions of war—in short, the rebellion at the present time may be likened to a crab, its legs lopped off so that it is incapable even of running backwards, and its helpless body and fragile shell at the mercy of the knife which is poised above it. The absurd protestations on the part of the South and the ridiculous belief entertained by its Northern partisans that the war will go on interminably even after the disorganization and scattering of the armies proper, is sheer nonsense. As well claim that the tail of a ram would go on bucking after its head was chopped off and its body cut up into sections! That the whole population south of Mason and Dixon's line intend to resolve themselves into single soldiers, leaving their homes and all the comforts which even chivalry cannot afford to despise, finding in every stump a fortification, and skirmishing for the annoyance of the enemy through swamps and morasses, subject at every turn to be met by some slave who has an old account to settle, and certain to be hung if captured—all that balderdash is too apparent to be seriously listened to. Private warfare has no recognized existence, and the capture of the main rebel army or even its disorganization would bring the individuals who chose to wage it down to the level of robbers and murderers, subject to be dealt with summarily whenever and wherever captured.

The social amenity party which President Lincoln is giving at City Point, and to which Secretary Seward has accepted an invitation, while the rumor is that the rebel leaders have not sent their regrets, looks forward to the speedy restoration of peace. It looks as though our opponents had at last yielded to the persuasions of powder that respect which they refused to cede to the suggestions of sense, the dictates of humanity, and the pleas of a patient people. In this view it must be remembered that an entire change of programme is necessitated on the part of the North. Our loyal and zealous journals must cease to declaim about monsters, and barbarians at the recital of whose deeds humanity blushes, once more tuning their lips to speak in dulcet tones of "our Southern brethren." Their names can now be mentioned without pollution, and the man who refuses to believe that the people with whom we a few years since associated in friendship, to whom we were united by ties of blood as well as by the bonds of a common political faith, became by one mistaken step devils whom the pulpit and press should heap vituperation upon, and curse before heaven as well as fight in the field—that man will no more be called copperhead and traitor. For if this war has not been wholly in vain, prosecuted without a purpose and brought to a conclusion without any adequate result, if the Union is indeed to be restored and the North and South reunited, are once again to live together under the same flag, fighting for the future shoulder to shoulder and not front to front, depend upon it that social amenities will have to be practiced and decency of language maintained in preliminary dealings on both sides.

TWO NEW JOURNALS.—We received last week the first number of the Journal of the Trades and Workingmen, edited and published in this city by A. M. Kenaday, long employed in the printing department of THE CALIFORNIAN, occasionally a contributor to its columns, and for a short time one of its proprietors. The Journal of the Trades is a neat little paper, evidencing care in all of its departments, and bearing upon its face a practical expression which argues well for its future. An article in the first number upon the old theatres of San Francisco has been very extensively copied. The Journal further announces that "Mark Twain" is going over the mountains in quest of petroleum, and will stop on the way at several places to furnish it with characteristic articles. In both instances we fear the Journal is wrong, as Mark tells us that he wouldn't even cross over to Oakland for all the oil that town could hold; and as for the other thing we know that he is engaged to write for THE CALIFORNIAN for a longer period of years than the chances are that he will live, and at a greater salary than the proprietors can possibly pay. All of which, however, does not prevent our wishing the Journal of the Trades a trade-wind to fill its sails.

Of the California Rural Home Journal, published by T. Hart Hyatt & Co., we have already spoken in highly commendatory terms. Its articles are varied, able and exhaustive; the selections are made with discrimination of the agricultural wants of our State, its typographical appearance, is unexceptionable, and altogether it seems destined to fill the bill excellently well. We would express a fear that it is too perfect of its kind to pay, but the remembrance that the same prophecy was made of THE CALIFORNIAN, and that the prophecy signally failed, induces us to cast no shadows in our cotemporary's path. May the same power speed it that is prayed to speed the plough!

CARRIING A WRONG IMPRESSION.—"Carrie Carleton" honored THE CALIFORNIAN by submitting a poem to it which was declined in a letter of thanks, accompanied with divers reasons, any one of which must, in itself, have satisfied the authoress' mind. In the first place, there was poetry in type to last a month or two; secondly, the poem, although mainly good, contained some weak and faulty lines which we thought Carrie might better; thirdly, the woes which victories bring in their train have been already sung so often and so well and so similarly that the theme has lost its novelty. It seemed scarcely worth while to cloud the joy of our readers over the fall of Charleston by telling them how many widows and orphans were the result. Again, we did not wish to be accused of wishing to discourage enlistments. And now we are told that the authoress, with that letter of thanks and declination in her possession, has been and gone and told that it was declined because of "being too radical." Oh, "Topsy Turvey," how could you? That was turning the thing topsy-turvy indeed!

NEW BOOKS FROM ROMAN'S.

LEAVES from the Note-Book of a New York Detective, "edited" (written that means) by Dr. John B. Williams, published by Dick and Fitzgerald, is about as representative a volume of cheap nonsense as one often finds, even in Eastern invoicees. It consists of a number of stories, nearly all of which have the same aim and termination. Some old gentleman in every instance—so far at least as we have waded into the contents—has a daughter with whom some young spoony is in love, and is murdered under circumstances which involve the girl or the spoony—sometimes either but oftener both—under a tremendous cloud of suspicion. The detective comes in, smells a mice in some out of the way corner, our two lovers are made happy and virtue is its own reward. To use an expression which all policeman will readily recognize and understand, every case which our detective favors us with, seems a "put-up job"—something expressly arranged for him to unravel and ferret out. His ideas of nature's great law of compensation are somewhat peculiar, for he tells us that one "Mary Norval" wronged of property left her by an uncle, by a wicked cousin, who nips the will, subsequently recovered the property, and as the culmination of her adventures "was soon after married to a wealthy Bostonian," her wicked cousin dying about the same time of delirium tremens. Now it was all right so far as the cousin was concerned; the author had a right to ring in any terrible retribution on the cousin that he pleased, but what on earth had poor "Mary" done that she should be married to a wealthy Bostonian? We pause for a reply.

Coal and Coal Oil, by Eli Bowen, is published by the Peterson Brothers. In this volume we have an effort by unscrupulous publishers to avail themselves of a popular excitement, and by giving a taking title to a book sell thousands of copies, when on its own merits alone they could not sell dozens. In a book containing between four and five hundred pages we have perhaps twenty in which coal oil is incidentally mentioned. The author tells us in his preface it was originally written and published some seven years ago under the title of The Physical History of the Earth. It is simply a series of geological speculations, in great measure devoted to the Mosaic account of the creation, and having a deal more to do with crude theories than with crude oil. The author says it was his first intention to publish the coal addition he has built on to the original volume as a separate document; it is a pity he hadn't, for that would have been more honest than to sell with only this pennyworth of bread such an intolerable deal of sack.

Lord Oakburn's Daughters, by Mrs. Ellen Wood, is printed by the Petersons, from advance proof-sheets purchased from the author. In Mrs. Wood will be recognized the prolific parent of East Lynne—which our best-informed dailies erroneously persist in attributing to her twin sister in sensations, Miss Braddon—and more other novels than we have space to enumerate. Printed in pamphlet form, the leaves are uncut, and want of time just now does not allow us to cut them, consequently our present notice of the book and its merits must necessarily be somewhat incomplete. Glancing over the pages, however, we imagine that in most respects it does not differ from its predecessors, for we discover an adultery or two, several seductions, and a fair seasoning of other sins. Variety is said to be the spice of life, and perhaps acting on that idea has enabled Mrs. Wood to achieve her remarkable success in literature. We shall have more to say of the book, however, after reading it.

The Practical Cook Book, by E. A. Howard, is published by Roberts Brothers, of Boston. As we unfortunately have no young housekeeper connected with the editorial department of THE CALIFORNIAN, it is impossible for us to give this valuable work that extended and critical notice which we would wish to. Unlike the famous cook book of old, the one before us does not tell us that the first thing in cooking a turbot is to catch a turbot. Of course we cannot pretend to have thoroughly digested the contents of the book, but a cursory examination warrants us in saying that we rather like the receipt for making muffins, though we do not go a great deal on the one for composing batter puddings, and are ready and willing to take direct issue with the authoress upon her style of drying pumpkins and peeling potatoes. Our friend "Auguste," a popular and distinguished chef de cuisine, promises us an elaborate and erudite critique of the work for next week.

The Beautiful Widow, by Mrs. Shelley, author of Frankenstein, is published by the Petersons. Mrs. Shelley offers considerable of a contrast to the half-shelly authoresses who in the taste of the present day find their profit and reputation. The title of the work may certainly be called a taking one, for a beautiful widow would take or capture most anybody. The story is one of English life, occasionally shifting to other scenes. It is quite dramatic in style, and the desire that persons will have to see what manner of woman the wife of Percy Bysshe Shelley was, and to estimate her mental calibre, will probably produce quite a demand for the book.

If the intention of Mrs. Lasselle had been to naught extenuate, instead of christening her book High Life in Washington, she would probably have called it "High Old Life in Washington." But she strikes the harp, or rather the chords of society gently and weakly, and gives us nothing to startle or shock anybody. It is one of the usual class of novels, spun out and diluted down according to a measured rule and an imposed standard. The very natural desire to know all about a city where young ladies shoot everybody that doesn't marry them will make the book sell. It is published by the Petersons.

FLOWERS—THE TULIP.

THE ancient Greeks scattered in the porticoes of their temples a succession of Narcissuses, Hyacinths, Anemones, Irises of all hues, Violets of all sorts, Roses of various kinds, and every odoriferous plant; they also adorned their altars and decorated the statues of their gods; they strewed flowers in the victor's path, and wore wreaths of them in their holy ceremonies. As Keats tells us:

"It was the custom there to bring away
The bride from home at blushing shut of day,
Veiled in a chariot, heralded along
By strewn flowers, torches, and a marriage song."

And at their banquets and festivals they crowned themselves with

"Garlands of every green, and every scent;
From vales deflowered or forest-trees branches-rent,
In baskets of bright osiered gold were brought High as the handles heaped, to suit the thought
Of every guest, that each, as he did please,
Might fauzy-fit his brows, silk-pillowed at his case."

No wonder that man, in the beautiful simplicity of earlier times, loved flowers, and hence formed an eloquent language that speaks to the heart in a voice more touching than the tenderest accents. No wonder that the most lovely ornament for the young virgin was thought to be a chaplet of fair flowers, the most glorious distinction of the warrior a wreath of bay-leaves. No wonder that the bier of the early dead was strewn with these fitting emblems of a passing existence.

Lady Mary Wortley Montagu says: "Happy the young and light-hearted maiden who, ignorant of the silly pleasures of the world, feels no occupation to be more agreeable than the study of plants and flowers. She seeks in the fields her most touching ornament; each season brings to her new joys, and every morning a fresh harvest of flowers repays her diligent cultivation; a garden is to her an inexhaustible source of delight and instruction." By a charming art these beautiful productions of nature are converted into liquid perfumes, precious essences, or valuable conserves. One of the most delightful accomplishments that can be chosen for the fair sex is that of catching the transient shades of beauty which are found upon flowers and fixing them on paper. The able pencil shows to us the Queen of Spring with her spherical form, her delicate colors, the beautiful green of her foliage, the thorns which protect her, the dew-drops which bathe her, and the butterfly which skims lightly over her beautiful form. The beauty and grace that may be displayed in grouping flowers, united with the gaiety of their colors and the harmony of their tints, are objects well worthy the attention of those who were born to render life delightful.

Nothing is forgotten in depicting them, and when we look upon the faithful representative, even in the depths of winter, we may fancy that we inhale the perfumes of spring. This study, in imparting a taste for all that is beautiful in Nature, fills the soul with ravishing emotions, and opens before us enchanted avenues of a world full of wonders. "Flowers," says Pliny, "are the joy of the shrubs which bear them," and this eminent observer of nature might also have added, "and of those who love them and cultivate them." Look at the Tulip, (Tulipa Sylvestris), and examine it. Thomson examined it with an admiring eye, and left us the following reflection of the beautiful flower in the mirror of poetry:

"Then comes the Tulip race, where beauty plays
Her idle freaks; from family diffused
To family, as flies the father dust,
The varied colors run; and while they break
On the charmed eye, the exulting florist marks,
With secret pride, the wonders of his hand."

On the banks of the Bosphorus the Tulip is the emblem of inconstancy, but it is also the symbol of the most violent love. The wild tulip is found in the fields of Byzantium, with its crimson petals and golden heart. The petals are compared to fire and the yellow heart to brimstone, and when presented by an admiring swain to his mistress, it is supposed to declare that such is the effect of the fair one's beauty, that if he sees her only for a moment his face will be as fire and his heart will be kindled to a coal. The tulip was called Tulipan or Turban from the similarity of its corolla to the superb head-dress of the barbarous Turks, who almost worshipped its elegant stem and the beautiful vase-like flower which surmounts it. They never ceased to admire the gorgeous hues of gold and silver, of purple, lilac and violet, of deep crimson and delicate rose-color, with every possible variety of tint all harmoniously blended together, and spread over the rich petals of this splendid member of the Court of Flora. The resemblance its shape bears to the turban is thus alluded to in Lallah Rookh:

"What triumph crowds the rich divan to day
With turbaned heads of every hue and race,
Bowing before that veiled and awful face
Like tulip beds, of different shape and dyes,
Bending beneath the invisible west winds' sighs?"

Formerly, a feast of tulips was celebrated in the seraglio of the Grand Seignior. Long galleries were erected, with raised seats, covered with the richest tapestries, presenting the appearance of an amphitheatre. On these were placed an almost infinite number of crystal vases, filled with the most beautiful tulips that could be procured. In the evening the scene was splendidly illuminated, the wax tapers, as they gave light, emitting the most exquisite odors. To these were added lamps of the most brilliant colors, forming on all sides garlands of opal, emerald, sapphire, diamond and ruby. Innumerable singing birds in cages of gold, roused by the splendor of the scene, mingled their warbling notes with the harmony of instruments whose chords were swept by invisible musicians. Showers of rose-water refreshed the air, when suddenly the doors were opened, and a number of young odalisks entered to blend the brilliancy of their charms and appearance with that of the enchanted scene.

In the centre of the seraglio a splendid pavilion shaded the Grand Seignior, who negligently reclined on costly skins, while the lords of his court, habited in their richest attire, were seated at his feet to behold the dances of the lovely women of the court in all the luxurious display of their light and dazzling dresses. These sometimes encircled and at others glided round the vases of the tulip whose beauty they sung. It was not seldom that a cloud rested on the Sultan's brow; then he looked upon all around with a stern and severe aspect. What! could chagrin then enter the soul of that all-powerful mortal? Had he lost one of his provinces? Did he fear the revolt of his fierce Janissaries? Ah, no! two poor slaves alone had troubled his heart. He had observed during the gaieties of the feast a young page presenting a tulip to a beautiful girl who had captivated him. The Sultan was ignorant of their secret, but a vague feeling of inquietude took possession of his heart—jealousy tormented and beset him. But what is the jealousy of a Sultan, or what are bolts and bars against Love? A look and a flower are enough for that mischievous urchin to change a horrid seraglio into a place of delight and to avenge beauty outraged by chains.

Tulips have had their worshippers in other parts of the world besides Turkey. It was from 1644 to 1647 that the tulipomania exercised its influence in Holland. The most precious kind was called Semper Augustus, and was valued at 2,000 florins. It is said to have been introduced into England about the year 1580, for Hakluyt thus writes in 1580: "Now within these four years there have been brought in England, from Vienna in Austria, divers kinds of flowers called Tulipas."

The Tulip is of the bulbs one of the easiest of culture, and the most beautiful, and no garden or conservatory of any pretension should be without a collection of them. IRIS.

A PLEA FOR THE SUPERNATURAL.

YOU do not believe in the supernatural? All evidence in support of communications between the seen and the unseen world to your mind is born out of the cunning of the knave and the credulity of the fool. The sweet humanities of religion, by which, in all ages, men have sought to link themselves and their destinies to something beyond the material and the apparent, are to you but vain delusions, weaknesses, or worse? To you there is nothing real but what the corporeal eye can mirror; nothing substantial but what can be felt and pressed, weighed and measured? In your estimation the blue infinitude is but the sky for MAN; the sun, the moon and stars were hung in the heavens to light his pathway alone; that his crops may grow, the bounteous rains fall; to fill the sails of his commerce the trade winds blow! All that exists for his use alone—and the object of all the machinery of the universe is that he may live and struggle and scheme—get rich, or fail. And then?—with "Dust to dust and ashes to ashes," it is ended!

I do not so believe. I believe in far more than I can actually see or for a certainty know. What is now revealed to us is, to my thinking, but a small part of the great whole. What you call supernatural is to me the natural. To me your belief is miserable; to you, mine is foolish and insane. Very well. A day will perhaps come when your sight will have a wider range; and it may come before your eyes have closed in what we call death—as it did to me. For there was a time when I thought as you now do; but, thank Heaven! that time has passed. Let me tell you:

It was midnight in the tropics. I stood at the helm of a little bark—her name and her destination are alike immaterial. I struck one bell of the middle watch, and, with scarce a hand resting on the wheel—so gentle and steady was the wind and so easily did the vessel steer—I drank in the beauty of the night.

I seemed the only living being in those silent waters; my watch-mates lay sleeping in comfortable corners about the decks, for vigilance was relaxed under the dolce far niente of the tropic seas. The moon was full and in the mellowness of its light the sea seemed broader and the eye capable of looking further into the mysteries of the heavens than by the garish glare of day. The soft trade wind nestled in the white sails above me, that neither flapped nor quivered, but, as the sailors say, "asleep," drew gently in their duty. Save the low rippling plash of the water at our bow, no sound broke the silence which brooded over all.

To my mind the scene which I have faintly attempted to portray, is grander, more sublime than aught else in Nature. Like the little voice that came to the Prophet on Horeb, it reveals God to the soul. It does not impress with the might of Omnipotence, as do the convulsions of earth and air, but it reveals to us the immensity of existence, the eternity of being.

I stood at the wheel which needed no control, and looked over the level plains of water, farther and farther, till the stars came down to meet it; above, into the sky, where the stars swung softly in the moonlight, like silver bells; behind us, at the stream of light which marked our course through the dark water, rivalling the "wake" of the moon, which left a silver road over the sea. My heart opened under the influence, and upon my soul there fell a calm—not a quiet of inertness, but a feeling of silence and awe, in which the soul recognized itself and its Maker.

Two bells came, but I did not strike them. I was busy with my thoughts. Over my head the Southern Cross arched its arms. My eye met its stars, and memory turned to the Northern sky—to the North Star and its "pointers;" back, back my recollections ran, through wild and wicked and shameful scenes, to my childish days—to the cottage on a Northern hill, with a window looking out upon the glory of the brilliant Northern night, and I almost fancied I heard the sweet voice of my mother as she called the stars by their names, and led my thoughts beyond their orbits to the throne of Him who made them, looking upon me the while with eyes that spoke the boundless love of a mother's heart.

Back to those sweet days my mind ran, and then returned to my present; my heart swelled with bitterness, and I groaned aloud. Black with sin and crime, owning the restraint of no law, human or divine, how could I think of my mother; how could I call upon the God I had defied!

A meteor flashed across the heavens; bright and swift it ran its brief course and disappeared forever. To me it was an emblem of myself: having no part in the sweet glory around, it was quenched in darkness; my heart accepted the omen, and I dropped my hands from the wheel in black despair.

A moment, and every nerve thrilled, my heart stopped its beating, and a strange feeling filled me. I stood like one changed to stone, but with every faculty alive. Softly, oh! how softly; clearly, oh! how clearly! a voice called me by my childish name. All the peace of heaven was in that tone; all the sweetness of infinite love spoke to my soul in its music, and before me stood my mother as she was years ago. I saw her—I knew her!—I turned, and she was gone!

I was alone again—save the ripple of the water there was no sound. But I was not alone in spirit! My mother had come from her rest to her child, and in that moment my eyes were opened; I knew that heaven was, that its gates were not shut to me, and that the eternal love sufficed to embrace me—a sinner. I wept tears of relief, of sweetness untold; a hope I never knew before sprang up in my heart, and a joy and comfort and resolve; and I blessed God. And when I struck four bells and left the wheel, it was as a different man.

You may say that I dreamed; that I was deluded by a powerful and overwrought imagination, you may prove to a physical demonstration that such a thing could not be; but you cannot convince me. That I could not hear and see this, on the trackless Indian Ocean, miles and miles from land, prove nothing. I did. Whether with the sense of the body I care not; but my soul saw and heard, and it knows.

FEARFUL.—An advertisement in the Evening Bulletin says: "Wanted, a situation by a practical Borer, lately from the East." In Heaven's name, were there not enough borers and borers here before, and what salary does he expect to get with a full market? Aside from the toreados that bore the piles of the wharves until they crumble, and the bottoms of ships until they founder and sink, have we not the wretches who stop you in the street with some prosy narration which does not interest you in the least, or who bore you with questions on every conceivable subject from the marriage of some utter stranger to both of you to the cutting of a baby's teeth? If that Borer gets a situation we hope it will be with a millstone around his neck, and that his first employment will be diving for oysters in the deepest part of the bay.

THE tongue was intended for a divine organ but the devil often plays upon it.—Jeremy Taylor.

THE FIRST JOHN BROWN.

TOWARDS the close of the seventeenth century, when a form of worship was forced upon the Scottish people by the sword, which was alike repulsive to their taste and to their conscientious judgment of the Gospel in its simplicity and purity, lived John Brown, a pious Edinburgh carrier, who thought it a duty to succor the persecuted ministers of the Gospel. One of these men had recently been succored under the roof of the poor carrier, and when he departed, made him acquainted with his hiding-place. Just at that time, Claverhouse, afterwards the Earl of Dundee, was scouring the country, with troopers as cruel as himself, in search of the hiding-places of the preachers, and knowing the reputation of Brown, went to his lonely dwelling, called the "Cottage on the Muir." Early in the morning the cottage of John Brown was surrounded by a troop of dragoons, with Claverhouse at their head. John, who had probably a presentiment of what might happen, urged his wife and daughter to stay within doors, insisting that as the soldiers were, in all likelihood, in search of some other person, he should soon be able to dismiss them. By this time, the tramping and neighing of horses, mingled with the hoarse laugh and vociferations of dragoons, brought John, half-dressed, to the door.

Claverhouse immediately accosted him by name; and in a manner intended for something betwixt flattery and irony, proceeded to make inquiries respecting "one Samuel Atkin—a godly man, and a minister of the Word, and outrageously addicted to prayer!" John admitted at once that the person referred to was not unknown to him, asserting, however, that of his present residence, or place of hiding, he was not free to speak.

"No doubt, no doubt," rejoined Claverhouse, "you know nothing! How should you, all in innocence and ignorance as you are? But here is a little chip of the old block, which may probably recollect better and save us the trouble of blowing out her father's brains, just by way of making him remember more accurately. You, my little farthing rushlight," continued Red Rob, alighting from his horse and seizing the girl rudely and with prodigious force by the wrists, "you remember an old man with a long beard and a bald head, who was here a few days, baptizing your sister, and giving good advice to father and mother, and who is now within a few miles of this house, to which you can readily and instantly conduct us, you know?"

The girl looked first at her mother, who had now advanced into the doorway, then at her father, and dropped her head, and continued to preserve a complete silence.

"And so," continued the questioner, "you are dumb: your tongue is a little obstinate or so, and you must not tell family secrets. But what think you of speaking with your fingers, or having a proper and pertinent answer just ready at your finger ends, as one may say? As the Lord lives and as my soul lives, but this will make a dainty nosegay" [displaying a thumpkin or finger screw] for my sweet little Covenanters; and then [applying the instrument of torture, meanwhile, and adjusting it to the thumb] you will have no manner of trouble in recollecting yourself; and don't knit your brow so [the pain had now become insufferable;] then we shall have you chatty and amusing, I warrant."

The mother, who could stand this no longer, rushed upon the brutal executioner, and with expostulations, threats and the most impassioned entreaties, endeavored to relax the questioner's twist.

"Can you, mistress, recollect anything of this man we are in quest of?" resumed Claverhouse, haughtily; "it may save us both some trouble, and your daughter a continuance and increase of your present suffering, if you will just have the politeness to make us acquainted with what you happen to know upon the subject."

"Woman!" exclaimed the husband, in a tone of indignant surprise, "hast thou so soon forgotten thy God? and shall the fear of anything that man can do induce thee to betray innocent blood?"

He said no more, but he had said enough, for from that instant the whole tone of his wife's feelings was changed, and her soul was wound up, as if by the hand of Omnipotence, into resolution and daring.

"Bravo!" exclaimed the arch persecutor, "bravo! old Canticles, thou word'st it well; and so you three pretty innocents have laid your holy heads together, and you have resolved to die, should it please God and us, with a secret in your breast, and a lie in your mouth, like the rest of your psalm-singing, hypocritical, canting sect, rather than discover guid Mr. Atkin, pious Mr. Atkin, worthy Mr. Atkin! But we shall see what light this little telescope of mine will afford on the subject," pointing to a earhine or holster pistol which hung from the saddle of his horse. "This cold, frosty morning requires that one," continued Claverhouse, "should be employed, were it for no other purpose than just to gain heart by the exercise. And so, old Pragmatical, in order that you may not catch cold by so early an exposure to the keen air, we will take the liberty, for the benefit of society, and for the honor and safety of the king—never to speak of the glory of God and the good of souls—simply and unceremoniously, and in the neatest and most expeditious manner imaginable, to blow out your brains." While he spoke the whole troop gathered round and presented muskets.

John Brown dropped down instantly, and as it were instinctively, upon his knees, while his wife stood by in seeming composure, and his daughter had happily become insensible to all external objects whatever.

"What!" exclaimed Claverhouse, "and so you must pray, too, and we shall have a last speech and a dying testimony lifted up in the presence of peat stacks and elay walls, and snow wreaths; but as these are pretty staunch and confirmed loyalists I do not care though we entrust you with five minutes of devotional exercise, provided you steer clear of king, council, and Richard Cameron. So proceed, good John, but be short and pithy. My lambs are not accustomed to long prayers, nor will they soften under the whining of your devotions."

But in this last surmise Claverhouse was for once mistaken, for the prayer of this poor uneducated man ascended that morning in expressions at once so earnest, so devout, and so overpoweringly pathetic, that deep silence succeeded at last to oaths and rihaldry; and as the following concluding sentences were pronounced there were evidences of better and relenting feelings: "And now, guid Lord," continued this death-doomed and truly Christian sufferer, "since thou hast nae mair use for thy servant in this world, and since it is thy good pleasure that I should serve thee better and love thee more elsewhere, I leave this puir widow woman, with the helpless and fatherless children, upon thy hands. We have been happy in each other here, and now that we are to part for a while, we maun e'en look forward to more perfect and enduring happiness hereafter. And as for the puir blindfolded and infatuated creatures, the present ministers of thy will, Lord, reclaim them from the error and evil of their course, ere it be too late; and may they who have sat in judgment and in oppression in this lonely place and on this blessed morning, and and upon a puir, weak, and defenceless fellow-creature, find that mercy at last from thee which they have refused to thy unworthy but faithful servant. Now, Isahel," continued this defenceless old man, "the time is come at last, of which I told you that day when first I proposed to unite hand and heart with yours; and are you willing, for the love of God and his rightful authority, to part with me thus?"

To which the poor woman replied, with perfect composure, "The Lord gave, and He taketh away." So saying, she approached her blindfolded husband, and elaped him around the neck, kissed and embraced him closely, and then, lifting up her person to an attitude of determined endurance, and eyeing from head to foot every soldier who stood with his earbine levelled, she retired slowly and firmly to the spot she had formerly occupied.

"Come, come, let's have no more of this whining work," said Claverhouse suddenly. "Do your duty, soldiers!"

But the word fell upon a row of statues; and though they all stood with their muskets presented, there was not a finger which had power to draw the fatal trigger. There ensued an awful pause, through which a "God Almighty bless your tender hearts," was heard coming from the lips of the now agitated and almost distracted wife. But Claverhouse was not in the habit of giving his orders twice, or of expostulating with obedience; so, drawing a pistol from the holster of his saddle, he primed and cocked it, and walking firmly and slowly up, placed the weapon close to the ear of his victim. There was a murmur of discontent and disapproval among the men as they looked upon the change which a single awful instant had effected; and even Red Rob had the hardihood to murmur with an oath loud enough to be heard, "This is too bad!"

The widow of John Brown gave one shriek of horror, as the fatal discharge was given; and then she began to unfold a napkin from her neck. "What think ye, good woman, of your bonnie man, now?" vociferated Claverhouse, returning the pistol with a plunge into the holster from which it had been extracted.

"I had always good reason," replied the woman to think well o' him, and I think mair o' him noo than ever. But how will Graham of Claverhouse account to God an' man for this morning's work?" continued she firmly.

"To man," answered the ruffian, "I can be answerable; and as to God, I will take him in my own hands!"

He then rode off and left her with the corpse. The napkin that encircled her neck, was now spread upon the snow and the disconsolate woman slowly gathered the scattered fragments of her husband's head, and covering the body with a plaid, took her infant in her arms and sat down beside her murdered husband, weeping bitterly. * * *

The cottage of John Brown has long disappeared from the muir, but the little spot where it stood is still green amidst the surrounding heath; and in the very centre of that spot there lies a slab, now almost covered with grass, upon which with a little clearing of the verdant growth from the fading characters, the following rude but expressive lines may still be read:

"Clavers might murder godly Brown,
But could not rob him of his crown."

THE UNFORTUNATE SAILOR.

IN the Memoirs of the Life of Sir Samuel Romilly, we find the following account of a case in which, as solicitor-general, he was engaged in 1807. It is impossible to read it without feeling impressed with a degree of horror at the indifference with which human life was legally, and often wrongfully, extinguished in the beginning of the century:

"A case has been lately laid before the attorney-general and me, by direction of the Lords of the Admiralty, to consider of the expediency of prosecuting for a libel the proprietor of a weekly newspaper called the Independent Whig, which has brought some facts to our knowledge that demand the most serious attention. A sailor, of the name of Thomas Wood, was tried by a court-martial at Plymouth on the 6th of October last, on a charge of having been concerned in the mutiny and murders which were committed on board the Hermione. It was in September, 1797, that the mutiny took place; and the prisoner being only, as was supposed, of the age of twenty-five when he was tried, could not have been more than sixteen when the crime was committed. The fact was proved but by a single witness: that witness, however, who was the master of the Hermione, swore positively that the prisoner, who, he said, at the time bore the name of James Hayes, was the very man whom he remembered on board the Hermione, and that he saw him take a very active part in the mutiny. Notwithstanding the positive oath of the witness thus identifying the prisoner, yet, as the witness said that he had never seen the prisoner since, and as the appearance of a man generally changes very considerably in the nine years which elapse between the ages of sixteen and twenty-five, little reliance could be had on such testimony. It was, however, the only evidence in support of the prosecution. But what was wanting in the evidence for the crown was supplied by the defence. It was delivered in writing, and was in truth a supplication for mercy rather than a defence. The following passage contains the whole substance of it:

'At the time when the mutiny took place, I was a boy in my fourteenth year. Drove by the torrent of mutiny, I took the oath administered to me on the occasion. The examples of death which were before my eyes drove me for shelter amongst the mutineers, dreading a similar fate with those that fell, if I sided with or showed the smallest inclination for mercy; and then follow entreaties for compassion on his youth, and a declaration that he had not enjoyed an hour's repose of mind since the event took place. The court found him guilty; he was sentenced to be hanged; and the sentence was carried into execution on the 17th of October. In the meantime, his brother and sister, who were in London, heard of his situation, and made application at the Admiralty. They insisted that their brother was innocent: that he was not even on board the Hermione; but was serving as a boy in the Marlborough, at Portsmouth, at the time the mutiny took place; they procured a certificate of this fact from the Navy Office, and transmitted it to Plymouth, where it arrived previous to the execution. The guilt of the prisoner, however, appeared so manifest from his own defence, that no regard was paid to the certificate, and the execution took place. This proceeding was animadverted on in the Independent Whig, in several successive papers, with very great severity. The members of the court-martial called upon the Lords of the Admiralty to punish the author of these libels; and, in consequence of this, they were laid before us. The attorney-general suggested, at the consultation, the propriety of making some inquiry into the fact before the prosecution was instituted. We neither of us entertained any doubt of the man's guilt; but yet the attorney-general thought that it would be advisable to be able to remove all possible suspicion upon that point. An inquiry was accordingly set on foot by the solicitor of the Admiralty; the result of which was, that the man was perfectly innocent, and was at Portsmouth on board the Marlborough when the crime was committed in the Hermione. He had applied to another man to write a defence for him; and he had read it, thinking it calculated to excite compassion, and more likely to serve him than a mere denial of the fact."

We hear nothing of the prosecution of the villainous captain for the crime of perjury, in this truly affecting case of legal murder.

We used to listen to her play, all the while wondering whether her soul was floating away far off, and her fingers only touched the keys so as to call it back to her—no, not to her—she never thought of self—to call it back to us, who loved her. She talked to the angels in the twilight! She would tell them long tales of how she loved us, and we loved her, how good God was, how beautiful the earth! And we two little things who scarcely understood their spirit talk, sat still, on the quiet balcony, close to the window; feeling as though God were very near, and we were telling Him beautiful prayers, with the notes of her piano for our voices.

It is not study that produces a writer; it is interest. In the mind, as in yonder chimney, to make the fire burn you must narrow the draught.—Carson.

STOP THAT COUGHING!

SOME of you can't, and we pity you. You have tried every remedy but the ONE destined by its intrinsic merit, to supersede all similar preparations. HOSTETTER'S CELEBRATED

STOMACH BITTERS.

A TIMELY WARNING TO THE SICK.—It is especially important at this time, when the markets of the United States are flooded with the direst poisons, under the name of imported liquors, and when domestic compounds, purporting to be medicinal, but not a whit less pernicious, are heralded to the world as "sovereign remedies," that the public should fully understand the facts. Be it known, then, that while all the diffusive stimulants called liquors are impure, and all the Tonics containing alcohol are manufactured with a fiery article containing amyl or fusel oil, a mortal poison; HOSTETTER'S CELEBRATED STOMACH BITTERS contain none of these things, but are a combination of pure Essence of Rye with the pure juices of the most valuable stomachic, antilithic and aperient herbs and plants, and that as a safe and rapid remedy for Dyspepsia and all its kindred complaints, this preparation stands before the world without a rival or competitor. Its sales to-day are equal to the combined sales of all the other Tonics advertised in the United States, and the certificates which authenticate its usefulness are signed by individuals of the highest standing in every professional calling and walk of life. FARRAND'S OSCILLATING

Amalgamator.

THIS UNRIVALLED IMPROVEMENT FOR THE REDUCTION AND AMALGAMATION OF Gold and Silver Ores, is now running daily at No. 206 Commercial street, between Front and Davis.

THIS AMALGAMATOR INVOLVES

NO COMPLICATED MACHINERY

And possesses the following advantages over all others now in use:

1st. It is capable of doing double the amount of work of the ordinary Pans, at a saving of more than one-half the power.

2d. It reduces the pulp finer, thereby producing a better result.

3d. It requires less quicksilver by one-half at a charge, whilst the loss by trituration is comparatively nothing.

4th. As an Amalgamator for gold contained in sulphurets, as also for very fine or flour gold, it has no equal.

5th. This Amalgamator involves no complicated machinery, and is less liable to get out of order than any of the pans.

DESCRIPTION OF FARRAND'S AMALGAMATOR.

In offering this Amalgamator to the public the inventor does not claim any new or scientific method of extracting the precious metals from the ore; he merely claims a new and simple combination of mechanical principles, whereby a great saving of power (full one-half in amount) is effected. The capacity of the machine varies with its size. The smallest, or prospecting size, will reduce 400 lbs. in three hours, and can be easily worked by the power of one man. The largest size will work 1,500 lbs in three hours, or six tons in 24 hours, with an application of a trifle more than one-horse power. This saving of power, as all mill-men are aware, is an important consideration particularly where fuel is scarce. The power so saved in running the Amalgamators may be advantageously employed to an increase of stamps, and thus proportionally increasing the work of the mill. This machine consists of a semi-cylindrical, trough-shaped vessel, in the interior of which is furnished with moveable concave discs, to be replaced when worn out, as in ordinary pans. The millers are convex, and attached to a substantial rock shaft, by which they are moved back and forward by crank or eccentric motion. The millers are held to their places by springs of moderate strength, the pressure of which may be easily regulated. The oscillating motion of the millers serves to keep the pulp in a constant state of agitation, thoroughly mixing it, and passing it under the millers without resort to any of the various expedients employed in Pans where a circular motion is maintained. The peculiar construction of this machine admits of its being worked with a much smaller charge of quicksilver, to any given amount of pulp than the flat-bottomed Pans. The spiral springs greatly assist in the work of reduction, by allowing the free admission of the pulp between the millers and discs, so that the pulp is made to actually work upon itself—as the dust of the diamond is made to reduce the gem itself. The advantage derived of thus avoiding all trituration in the presence of quicksilver, must be apparent to any one at all acquainted with gold or silver amalgamation.

Trials made with this machine in the presence of experts, during the last six months, have been pronounced highly satisfactory. It is peculiarly well adapted to employment by small mining operators in distant localities, as it can readily be taken to pieces and packed upon mules.

A large size machine is constructed without dies or millers, but simply with arms to act as stirrers, to be used in connection with several of the Amalgamators as a "Separator," as it is found that the peculiar motion given to these arms, in connection with the concave shape of the body of the machine, renders it most effectual for such a purpose.

RECORD OF THE CAMPAIGNS.

THE atmosphere is so charged with the electricity of good tidings that our citizens are scarcely fit for anything else than giving vent to their expressions of joy and gratitude for the last crowning glory to the armies of the Union. The horrors of civil strife are now nearly at an end. It is beyond belief to imagine that the proud spirit which gave birth to, nurtured and developed, the hellish design of disuniting the great American States, can ever survive this last overwhelming shock. The pride of secessionism is humbled to the dust; and the spirit of the Southern people which for four years has been overawed by Southern bayonets now can rise triumphant, and proclaim its adhesion to the doctrine of indivisibility.

We cannot follow the regular style of dates in the "record" this week, but collate all points of interest in the ten days' struggle. From all we can glean, the theory is probable that Lee had formed a plan to crush Sherman and then fall back to attack Grant. To hide his real designs, he attacked our lines on the 25th, but Grant saw his motives, and took him at his word, and massing all his forces on the south side of the James drove the rebels one by one from their entrenchments. We condense herewith the details and final result:

On the morning of the 25th of March, at half-past 4 o'clock, an attack was made by the enemy in three divisions under Gen. Gordon. The line held by the Third Brigade 1st Division, was seized and, with little effort, Fort Steadman fell into their hands. Establishing themselves on the hill they turned the guns of the fort against us; but the Union troops on either flank stood firm. On the arrival of the Second Brigade, a charge was made on the hill, aided by the troops of the First Division on their flank, and the enemy were driven out with the loss of 1,600 prisoners. General McLaughlin was captured in Fort Steadman. The fighting was kept up steadily, and after various results, the day ended with the advance of our entire lines. The following are the essential points in the General Order issued to the army after the first day's fighting:

"The enemy, with a temerity for which he has paid dearly, massed his forces and succeeded, through the reprehensible want of vigilance in the 3d brigade of the 1st division of the Ninth Corps, in breaking through our lines, capturing Fort Steadman and batteries Nos. 9, 10 and 11. The prompt measures taken by Major-General Parke, the firm bearing of the troops of the Ninth Corps on adjacent portions of the line held by the enemy, and the gallant 3d division of this Corps, together with the energy and skill displayed by Brig.-Gen. Hartsuff, quickly repaired the disaster. The enemy was driven from Fort Steadman and our lines, with heavy losses in killed and wounded, leaving eight battle flags and over 1,900 prisoners. The result of the day was the defeat of the enemy's plans and the capture of their strongly entrenched picket line, also the capture of ten battle flags and 2,800 prisoners."

The following are the losses of the day on our side. In the Second Corps, killed, 51; wounded, 462; missing, 302; in the Ninth Corps, killed, 60; wounded, 388; missing, 506. The Second Corps captured 361 prisoners. Grant says that our losses since the 25th of March, in killed, wounded and missing will scarcely reach 7,000.

From the 25th to the 30th there are at hand no particulars of any fighting in that interim. It is presumable that after the first day's battle both armies were occupied in maneuvering and strengthening each other's positions. Grant seems to have pressed forward his troops with great energy and rapidly fortified his lines. Sheridan's cavalry arrived safely to his aid, and the record of his valorous deeds are not exceeded in brilliancy by the greatest hero in the annals of war. Fifteen monitors, forty ironclads, and an innumerable fleet of smaller vessels made their appearance in the James. Each day developed new results. On the 1st of April, the greater portion of the army not engaged with the enemy were erecting earthworks on the new line and repairing the roads. The combined forces of Sheridan's cavalry and Warren's infantry advanced against the enemy, driving him several miles and capturing 4,000 prisoners and many guns. The rebels retreating to their works, were flanked by the Fifth Corps and again routed. Moving south by the White Oak road they were vigorously pursued by Sheridan. McKenzie's cavalry from the Army of the James meantime advanced on the Ford road, and again was the enemy flanked and defeated. Thus had the tide of disaster followed up the retreating foe till it culminated in the capture of Lee's two greatest strongholds, Petersburg and Richmond.

President Lincoln went down to City Point and thence kept up a continuous telegraphing of the advantages gained each day. April 2d, at 4:30 P. M., Grant telegraphed as follows:

"We are now up and have a continuous line of troops. In a few hours we will be entrenched from the Appomattox, below Petersburg, to the river above. The whole captures since the army started out will amount to not less than 12,000 men, and probably 50 pieces of artillery; do not know the number accurately. A portion of Foster's division of the Twenty-fourth Corps made a gallant charge this afternoon, and captured a very important fort from the enemy, with its entire garrison."

On the morning of the 3d of April, the following despatch flashed its joyful tidings through the length and breadth of the land. It tells the whole story and sums up in a few words the grand result of this week of battles:

"We took Richmond at 8:15 this morning (April 3d.) I captured many guns. The enemy left in great haste. The city is on fire in one place; we are making every effort to put it out. The people received us with enthusiastic expressions of joy. Gen. Grant started early this morning with the army towards the Danville road, to cut off Lee's retreating army, if possible. President Lincoln has gone to the front."

"WEITZEL."

The Secretary of War telegraphed on the same day to the Governor of this State that both Petersburg and Richmond were occupied by our troops.

Since the morning in which our troops entered the rebel capital, the telegraph has been giving us gladdening and still more glorious news. Grant and Sheridan are now in full pursuit of Lee's diminished forces; only amounting now to two small columns. It is beyond doubt that they will be captured. All that remains anything like organization have gone north of the Appomattox, apparently heading for Lynchburg or Danville. The houses through the country are nearly all used for hospitals. The country in every direction is filled with fleeing soldiers; 25,000 prisoners fell into our hands.

The latest news, up to the hour of going to press, is that Lee and the remainder of his demoralized army have been captured by Sheridan. To give good grounds for its truthfulness we give the following from Gen. Grant, dated at Nottoway Court House:

"Last night Sheridan was on the Danville Railroad, south of Amelia Court House, and sent word to Gen. Meade, who was following with the Second and Sixth Corps, by what is known as the River Road, that if troops could be got up in time, he had hopes of capturing, or dispersing the whole of Lee's army. I am moving with the left wing, commanded by Ord, by the Cox, or direct Burkesville Road. We will be to-night at or near Burkesville. I have had no communication with Sheridan or Meade to-day, but hope to hear very soon that they had come up with and captured or broken up the balance of the Army of Northern Virginia. In every direction we hear of men of that army going home, generally without arms. Sheridan reports Lee at Amelia Court House to-day."

From Sherman, we learn that a portion of his forces had an engagement with the enemy at Mount Olive on the 21st and 22d. It was very severe and continuous. Johnston commanded the rebel line. The battle was arrayed on two opposite ranges of hills on the south side of the Neuse, our troops facing west. Both armies were defeated by earthworks. Sherman's were hastily constructed. The conflict was desperate on both sides, the rebels charging our lines, and our men charging theirs five times. The fighting on Sunday was principally done by the Twenty-eighth and Fourteenth Corps. On Monday, the Seventh and Eighteenth Corps came up and relieved them. The rebel forces were finally overpowered and retreated in confusion towards Raleigh. The Union army entered Smithfield, about half-way between Goldsboro and Raleigh.

The following is the substance of a despatch from the N. Y. Herald's correspondent in front of Mobile:

"On the 23d of March, Gen. Smith, of the Sixteenth Corps, accompanied by Gen. Canby and staff, that day arrived at Nasby's Mills on Fish river, on the east side of Mobile bay, ten miles distant from it and twenty-six miles from Mobile. The entire Thirteenth Corps, under Gen. Granger, is expected, and the Sixteenth Corps, at Danby's Mills, during the evening of the 23d. Firing in the direction of Mobile was heard for twenty-four hours previous to the 23d. It was supposed to proceed from the monitors engaging shore batteries."

The Richmond Sentinel has the following from Tennessee:

"Thomas, having transferred a portion of his army to Knoxville, and united them with Gillen, is said to be moving in the direction of the Virginia line. At last accounts his command had reached the vicinity of Greenville, a little over half way between Knoxville and Bristol. The expedition is accompanied by an engineer corps of 2,000 men, who are engaged in building the railroad in front as fast as the enemy reach them. Communication with the base, at Knoxville, is kept up. The object of the expedition, no doubt, is to possess and hold Southwestern Virginia, and, if practicable, move on and capture Lynchburg."

News from the headquarters of the Department of East Tennessee states that the advance of Stoneman's force, commanded by Major Keogh, A. D. C., entered and captured the town of Boone, N. C., on the 27th of March. Gen. Stoneman's command is now well into North Carolina, and will be heard of soon in the heart of rebellion.

Grant and Sherman had an interview at City Point on Monday evening. A number of Grant's staff and Corps commanders were present at the meeting, Sherman said success was assured from the commencement. The enemy were unable to offer any serious opposition. He said his boys had no trouble in chasing the rebels. Grant and Sherman, after consultation in the headquarters tent, had an interview with the President. Sherman gave him a graphic account of his operations, and represented his army as capable of accomplishing the grandest results.

The Jackson Ledger, of April 1st, says that Masters Stewart and Turner, two lads about seventeen years of age, have been prospecting for quartz at Butte City, and during the past week struck a pocket of decomposed quartz from which they have taken out $1,000. A very rich claim of rotten quartz has recently been struck near Tuttle town, Tuolumne county, (as the Democrat is informed), which yields a hundred dollars to the pan. Sorocco & Co., at their quartz mill near Volcano, cleaned up, lately, after a run of thirteen days, and had the snug sum of $9,000. The Dutch claim at Buckeye Hill, owned by Huffman, Muller & Co., after a week's run, yielded $1,700. This (says the Nevada Transcript) is about the average yield of the claims in that locality. The Hueston Hill mine, at Grass Valley, produced $8,500 in five days running. A ledge eighteen inches in thickness, and rich in sulphurets and free gold, has been found near the French Mill, Nevada county, after running a tunnel 120 feet.

Dr. BENTON will lecture on Psychology, or the Science of the mind, to-night at Platt's Hall. Dr. Benton comes before the public with accredited local references from such men as Mr. Leland, the Rev. Dr. Wadsworth, and others, as to his personal ability; and, doubtless, his series of lectures will prove highly amusing as well as instructive, as he experiments with electric magnetism, illustrating the remarkable influences of the mind over susceptible persons while under magnetic influences.

THE ELECTROPATHIC INSTITUTE, No. 645 Washington street, established February 12th, 1860, by an association of scientific gentlemen, for the cure of disease and the suppression of quackery.

Persons suffering from disease can rely upon the most scientific and honorable treatment at the above Medical Institute, and should their cases be within the limit of cure, the Resident Physician will warrant them a perfect and permanent relief from their affliction. And if their case be incurable, he will so state, and advise them of the best method of relief, so far as science can go to accomplish the object.

The basis of treatment at the Institute is the electro-pathic system; but the Resident Physician, J. H. JOSSELYN, M. D., being a graduate of the University of Pennsylvania, considers himself competent to treat with medicines, but, in no case, will he make use of mercurials, those life-destroying drugs; but, instead, will use the most approved vegetable remedies.

Since the establishment of the Institute, almost every nameable disease has been treated with success, especially those complaints which have been ill-treated by quacks, the names of which should never be printed in a newspaper.

Females should bear in mind, that the only safety in the treatment of complaints peculiar to their sex, is to have a physician who has made the female economy his particular study. In the resident physician at the Institute, they will find a surgeon who can sympathize with them in their troubles, and relieve them, no matter what they may be.

To the rheumatic and nervous person, this Institute offers the blessing of certain and permanent cure.

For those suffering from the effects of mercury, and those diseases for which mercury is usually given, there is no remedy so sure as the Electro-pathic system, as practiced at the Institute, 645 Washington street.

Come one, come all, and receive the blessings of health!

The motto is—a perfect cure or no money required! All letters answered with promptness and with pleasure, if directed to

ALLEN'S LUNG BALSAM!

THE REMEDY FOR CURING

CONSUMPTION, COUGHS, COLDS,

ASTHMA, CROUP,

DISEASES OF THE THROAT, BRONCHITIS,

Pains and Oppression of the Chest or Lungs,

DIFFICULT BREATHING,

AND ALL THE

DISEASES OF THE PULMONARY ORGANS.

ITS ACTION IS EXPECTORANT, ALTERATIVE, SUDORIFIC, SEDATIVE, DIAPHORETIC and DIURETIC, which renders it one of the most valuable remedies known for curing diseases of the lungs. It excites expectoration, and causes the lungs to throw off the phlegm or mucus, changes the secretions and PURIFIES THE BLOOD; heals the irritated parts; gives strength to the digestive system, brings the liver to its proper action, and imparts, beyond the possibility of doubt, strength to the whole system. Such is the immediate and satisfactory effect, that it is warranted to break up the most distressing cough in a few hours' time, if not of too long standing. It is warranted to give entire satisfaction even in the most confirmed cases of Consumption. It is warranted not to produce costiveness, which is the case with most remedies, or affect the head, as it contains no Opium in any form. It is warranted to be perfectly harmless to the most delicate child, although it is an active and powerful remedy for restoring the system. There is no real necessity for so many deaths by Consumption, when ALLEN'S LUNG BALSAM will prevent it, if only taken in time.

ON FLIRTS.

MR. Hugh Elliot, some time minister at Dresden, and a most brilliant and observant man, has left us a picture of Lady Hamilton which will interest all women, and men too, because Lady Hamilton's celebrated flirtation with Nelson will always be historic; and further, because the unhappy fate of the heroine has often been related to sympathizing English men and women. Had she not flirted with Nelson, we have been assured that the battle of the Nile would never have been fought, and the supremacy of the British fleet would never at that time have been so established.

"Lady Hamilton," writes this acute observer of the woman whom the greatest hero in England thought the most beautiful creature in the world, "is bold, forward, coarse, assuming and vain; her figure is colossal, but (except her feet, which are hideous) well shaped. Her bones are large, and she is exceedingly embonpoint. * * * Lord Nelson is a little man, without any dignity, who, I suppose, must resemble what Suwarrow was in his youth, as he is like all the pictures I have seen of him. Lady Hamilton takes entire possession of him, and he is a most willing captive, the most submissive and devoted I have ever seen. Sir William is old and infirm, all admiration of his wife, and never spoke to-day but to applaud her." Here, then, we have a picture of a most accomplished flirt, who flirted herself into fortune and into fame, and who would have done yet more, had fortune further aided her. Mr. Elliot wrote, "Lady Hamilton will captivate the Prince of Wales, whose mind is as vulgar as her own, and will play a great part in England." The fickle goddess, however, to whom worldlings bend, deserted this celebrated woman; she had risen from the low position of a chambermaid and a painter's model to be the idol of our greatest seaman, and, after serving England more than is generally acknowledged, at last, as a retribution for her wickedness, she died in misery and want.

Now how did Lady Hamilton capture Nelson and lead him into misery and sin? How was she enabled to entice away from a wife whom he loved, and with whom, as he said, he could find no fault? Simply by flirtation; a practice as dangerous as it is universal, and one of the most harmful in the world. Truly, if we look at it from the first incipient symptoms to its varied and final results, half the misery of the civilized world is to be put down to it; yet almost every young lady or gentleman, and many an old one, is willing to indulge in it; and not a few defend the practice, and assert that they think it perfectly harmless. "Surely," they say, "there can be no harm in a little innocent flirtation."

Now it is perhaps an invidious task to condemn so universal a practice; but, without at once doing so, we may be permitted to say that an innocent flirtation is very difficult to be met with. That which is most innocent takes between two young and unmarried people whose affections are as yet fixed upon no particular object. A young gentleman who is desirous of finding a partner for life, and who is, in nine cases out of ten, asked to a party or a picnic, that he may do so, very naturally, and just as harmlessly, looks around him to find the prettiest and the most eligible girl. His intentions, we may believe, although he perhaps does not acknowledge this to himself, are honestly bent towards matrimony. If he is a young man of to-day, he has a tacit reservation to keep single as long as he can. He does not go into the marriage market as one goes into other markets, with the immediate intention of at once securing his purchase or his choice. He is a matrimonial fisherman, and intends, as he well may, to indulge in the sport, and to play with his fish before he finally lands it. But what is sport to him is perhaps death to others. The silly fishes are quite ready to take the bait, and perhaps one or two encumber his hook, while he has no intention of drawing them up. If, to turn to our former simile, he institutes a preliminary huxtering, an examination of the market, a searching into a similarity of tastes and pursuits, he is pretty sure to be called a flirt; and yet what is the poor man to do? The young ladies in such a case should be very careful of their hearts, for society, while allowing them every latitude, does not permit them the liberty of choice and proposition, except during leap year, a year of which they never take advantage.

If a young lady tries to make herself agreeable to this young man, if she talks earnestly or rattlingly, if she laughs, dances, and giggles with him, and puts herself in the most graceful attitudes, her female friends will at once charge her with design, and stamp her as a flirt. We, however, should not so call her. What she has done is legitimate enough. There would be no marriages whatever unless ladies in some measure took the initiative; and marriage is and always will be of so intense an interest, of so gigantic an importance to woman, and to the world in general, that we can forgive anything within the bounds of delicacy and fairness which a young lady may do in order to get the articles of partnership for life fairly drawn up. Women must, from their good humor and kindly nature, also make themselves pleasing; they are the charms of society and of life; without them man would relapse into utter barbarity; and for these reasons, the innocent flirt—that is, if she does not exceed the bounds we have marked—may be reckoned as quite harmless and as so doing her duty, and that which, simply enough, her mother and grandmother did before her.

Perhaps we should not follow the custom of the world in applying the term thus loosely to those who carry on fairly the preliminaries to the matrimonial warfare, and commence their approaches as regularly as a general laying siege to a town. Innocent flirtation, although a very dangerous pastime, especially to women, is fair enough; but as gamblers never care about sitting down to eighteenpenny rubbers, or for playing double-dummy at whist for the love of it, with their friends or their wives, so the true flirt, either male or female, does not care about the pastime unless there is a little spice of wickedness in it. If a young lady is engaged to a very estimable but easy-going young fellow, of whose heart she is quite secure, she will not be satisfied unless by a cunning flirtation she raises up just the ghost of an antagonistic jealousy in it. She will dance with a man who uses his legs and feet more gracefully than her lover; she will sit next to another at a picnic, ask him for a flower, or convey to him and to her faithful Corydon how immensely she is charmed with the company of another. She will delight to tease him, very often with the express purpose of getting up a lover's quarrel, and of seeing how far she can wound the heart which has laid itself at her feet. When she does so, she becomes at once the flirt proper, and flirtation no longer is innocent, but actually wicked.

What, then, is this practice? Wicked flirtation, which is always more or less dangerous and immoral, and which, as our newspaper will show us, has so often such tragic and disgraceful ends, is the exercise of our powers of fascination and of pleasing, with the express purpose of conveying "to the mind of a person of the opposite sex, the assurance that his or her society is peculiarly agreeable to us." There are a thousand ways of doing this, and every way is wrong. A word, a squeeze of the hand, a gesture of admiration, or, at times, one of impatience, will equally serve, and will send back the blood to the heart of a silly girl with a flutter of impatient and tumultuous joy. Both sexes are equally to blame; for this kind of flirtation is a species of lying, and one can lie with the eye or hand as well as with the tongue. There are other songs without words besides those of Mendelssohn. Those songs are songs of the Syrens; they are flatterers, which lead those who listen to them to sad destruction.

The man who gives himself up to flirtation—unless, as a single man, he does so to get married, or, as a married man, he does it in a burlesque and open way, and advertises his friends that he carries on the little game merely for the fun of the moment—is a very contemptible being. Although he carefully guards himself against making any promises, and loudly proclaims himself as a non-marrying man, yet he has no right to indulge in this soft dalliance of the will and intention. He has no right to play and trifle with the feelings of a young woman just to gratify his vanity—for vanity is, after all, at the bottom of this, unless, indeed, we put it away for a worse passion. The tenor of his behavior to an honorable woman can have but one construction; nay, however he may like flirting himself, he would probably be very unwilling to have his daughter or his sister subjected to the same kind of address. Besides, while a man is engaged in flirtation with a girl, and perhaps—nay, most likely—raising hopes in her bosom which he will never fulfill, nor she will ever forget, he prevents her from receiving the attentions of an honorable and good man, who would, in all probability, offer her his hand.

The female flirt has this excuse, that she does not so much endanger the hearts or hurt the reputations of her partners in the game as the male one. On the contrary, in carrying war into the enemy's country, in overthrowing and damaging him, and in revenging upon him the injuries he has done to her sex, she may perhaps consider that she is doing a very useful and praiseworthy thing. Certainly there may be that way of looking at the matter; but whether we consider it thus lightly, or not, we shall find that women are injuring their own sex and doing a very dangerous and foolish thing. After all, a young single woman who flirts, merely confesses that she cannot attach young fellows to her by fair means. She wishes to attract more notice than falls to her share, and being unable to do so in the ordinary way, she takes the extraordinary. But she does so at great sacrifice and cost to herself. A married flirt is not the most happy of mortals, because her husband is very likely to suspect that as she attached him she may attach others. Nor are the gentlemen who are caught by flirts the fish most worth catching. They are men without much delicacy or perception, and, having required a great deal of attention to attach them, may, and most likely will, demand much humoring and cajoling during the course of their married life.

Of all kinds of flirts—the romantic, who looks into your eyes and asks if you do not like Tennyson's poetry, and if the moonlight is not very beautiful; the manly, who rides to cover, and talks about horses and dogs, who knows when the St. Leger is run, and admires the stately woods and pretty race-course of Goodwood; the scientific, who begs you to class a fly, or to pronounce upon a fossil; the sentimental, who believes that happiness does not exist in this life, and who, while asserting that there is "no such thing as true love," tries to make you a specimen of the true lover; the "gushing," who talks nonsense purposely, and says, "Well, there now, 'tis my way, you know; I am such a giddy thing!"—of all these, together with the boating flirt, the dancing and the musical flirt, who somehow makes love to you in the pauses of the song; of all kinds of flirts, we repeat, the married flirt is the worst of all. There are many married flirts; they are indeed said to be on the increase; and the ingenious way in which they attract young fellows, and insinuate that they are "blighted beings," or have made a "mistake in marriage," is equally curious and reprehensible. It was in something of this way that Cleopatra entangled Antony, and Lady Hamilton Lord Nelson. It was with fine scorn that the former, placing all her selfish love in the foreground, in the midst of her passion and wondrous power, stooped to ask Antony after his wife—"How is the married woman?" So also Lady Hamilton taught Nelson first to pity, and then almost to despise, the good wife whom he had wronged. The married flirt is by far the worst of all: and the only possible, but very inefficient excuse for her is, that she began the practice when single and in a bad school. In France we have, however, a large number of married flirts, from a cause exactly contrary to this: because there the sexes are so strictly separated before marriage that they cannot indulge in the pastime until marriage has given them full liberty—an indulgence of which they are not slow to avail themselves.

The proximate cause of flirtation is said to be a wish to please, to be polite, and to make the party pass off well; but the primary one is, we fear, nothing but a selfish wish to shine and to attract praise. It may be all very pleasant, but it is certainly exceedingly wrong, and being wrong it is stupid and unwise. It goes against true propriety in both sexes; with a woman it is unfeminine as well as injudicious; with a man it is unmanly. With only one class of people can it be excused, and that class is a large one, formed of those light, facile, agreeable persons, who have neither real heart nor feeling, but who fancy they have plenty of both; who are compounded of a graceful desire to please and a continual and selfish wish to be pleased, and who flutter about from one person to another, saying tender nothings, and amusing themselves in a butterfly way, to the best of their ability, and to the utter forgetfulness of anybody else. The only thing that we should wish to do with these pleasant little parties is that which Sam Weller did to the Fat Boy when he tried to flirt with pretty Mary. "Oh Sam," said he, slowly, "shouldn't I like to give her a kiss?" Upon which it is related that Sam, with a long whistle, took him into a corner, and dismissed him with a quiet kick.

The subjects of flirtation can easily put a stop to the practice if they choose; for if they do not allow their vanity to be played upon, then they will escape scot free. When a young lady fixes her eyes upon a young gentleman, and heaves a pensive sigh, the best way for him to do is to look quite unconscious. Thus, when our antagonists determine upon firing explosive shells and steel-pointed shot, John Bull puts up his iron plates; a little quiet scorn and impenetrable dullness will disarm the most determined flirt in the world. After all, although we condemn flirts, we do not approve of prudes. What we want to arrive at in the society and mixture of the sexes is natural, quiet, jovial and cheering conversation, secular or religious, without any unfair attempt at the entanglement of the passions; when this is attained, we can fairly believe that a lover or a sweetheart will be most calmly and wisely chosen, and with the very best chance of making a fitting and faithful husband or wife.—From the Gentle Life.

FLY-FISHING.—The great secret in fly-fishing, after a person has acquired the art of throwing a long and a light line, is perseverance—that is, constant and continuous exertion. Fish are whimsical creatures, even when the angler, with all appliances and means to boot, is placed apparently under the most favorable circumstances. Let him, however, commence his operations with flies, which, upon general principles, he knows to be good—for example, a water-mouse body and dark wing, hare-ear and moorfool wing, red hackle and teal or mallard wing. It may frequently happen that for an hour, or even two hours, he will kill nothing; but, then, it will as often happen, that for another couple of hours he will pull them ashore with a most pleasing celerity.

Awake but one, and, lo, what myriads rise!

Next comes a pause of another hour or more, during which little or nothing is obtained, so that if the intermediate period is frittered away on green banks, eating biscuits, success is doubtful or impossible. We believe that the appetites and motions of the finny tribes are regulated and directed by certain (to us) almost imperceptible changes in the state of the atmosphere, with which, as they do not proceed from any determinate or ascertained principles of meteorological science, it is not easy for the angler to become acquainted; and, therefore, the only method to remedy the désagrément thus arising, is to fish without ceasing so long as he remains by the "pure element of waters."—The Rod and the Gun.

ALAMEDA PARK HOTEL.

This new and elegant House will be opened for the reception of guests, on SATURDAY, the 18th instant. It is situated on the Alameda Encinal, within three minutes' walk of the San Leandro Railway, and three miles from the end of the wharf, between which and the foot of Broadway, steamers ply at frequent intervals during the day. The hotel can be reached by boat and rail, in forty minutes from Montgomery street. The location is in the midst of a dense grove, and, as a suburban resort, cannot be surpassed for beauty and healthfulness.

This hotel is splendidly fitted up with all the modern improvements, and in every respect will be conducted as a first class public house.

The proprietor would call especial attention of families to the attractiveness of this locality, so accessible, and yet retired, and free from the turmoil of the city.

Bowling Alleys, Billiard rooms, and all of the leading journals of the day will be at the disposal of visitors, while the sportsman can find an abundance of wild game in the vicinity of the hotel.

By a strict attention to business the proprietor hopes to merit the public patronage.

PATENT CHIMNEY TOP.

THIS useful invention is confidently recommended in all cases where it is desirable to create a great draft.

ON STEAMSHIPS

Its use will dispense with the use of the blower and the tall smoke stack, as it causes the furnace to consume the smoke. It has been successfully used on steamers, in San Francisco. The proprietor has permission to refer to Chas. McIntire, Esq., as to its value on steamers.

FOUNDRIES AND MACHINE SHOPS,

And all works requiring a great beat will find it of immense benefit. Stephen Culverwell and Lyon & Co., Brewers, are now using it, and to them I refer.

ON SAILING VESSELS

It has been used to great advantage, where, on account of baffling winds, it is difficult to keep fire in the galley.

FOR SMOKY CHIMNEYS

It is a sure cure, and has been used on the Russ House and other first-class buildings in this city.

FOR VENTILATION,

It is unexcelled, and is recommended to architects and owners of buildings where ventilation is required.

FOR MINING PURPOSES

It is well adapted, thoroughly removing all foul air from shafts and tunnels.

The proprietor also refers to the following gentlemen, who have used it: Capt. Lassen, brig Crimea; Dr. Nuttall, Calhoun & Son, Printers; Edgerly & Wickman, Ship Chandlers; J. B. Quintin, builder; Philip Cadue, Esq.

A NEW INVENTION!

LEWIS'S

Self-Acting Wagon Brake!

By means of this invention, the wheels of a wagon are made to lock themselves when going down hill, certainly and effectively, and are released the moment there is any strain on the horses, without attention on the part of the driver.

It is already in use in many parts of the East, and has everywhere given satisfaction.

It will lock a wheel so that it CANNOT REVOLVE, the efforts of the wheel to turn making the lock tighter.

It operates in an instant, locking or unlocking as necessary.

It needs no care and requires no exertion.

It cannot fail to work, and is easier on the team than the common brake.

Simple in its construction, and costing no more than the common lock, it gives perfect security, and a child may drive the heaviest wagon over the steepest roads.

It can be used in the same way as the common hand or foot brake: A touch on the lever will effectually lock the wheels, and

RUNAWAYS ARE IMPOSSIBLE.

State, county or shop rights for sale.

IN THE DISTRICT COURT OF THE Twelfth Judicial District of the State of California, in and for the City and County of San Francisco.

AMALIE J. K. SCHAEFEN, Plaintiff; vs. AUGUSTE A. SCHAEFEN, Defendant.—Action brought in the District Court of the Twelfth Judicial District of the State of California, in and for the City and County of San Francisco, and the Complaint filed in said City and County of San Francisco, in the office of the Clerk of said District Court.

The People of the State of California send greeting to AUGUSTE A. SCHAEFEN, Defendant: You are hereby required to appear in an action brought against you by the above-named Plaintiff in the District Court of the Twelfth Judicial District of the State of California, in and for the City and County of San Francisco, and to answer the complaint filed therein, within Ten Days, (exclusive of the day of service,) after the Service on you of this Summons—if served within this County; or, if served out of this County, but in this District, within Twenty Days; otherwise, within Forty Days—or judgment by default will be taken against you, according to the prayer of said Complaint.

The said action is brought to obtain a decree of this honorable Court dissolving the Bonds of Matrimony existing between Plaintiff and Defendant, and for general relief.

And you are hereby notified that if you fail to appear and answer the said complaint, as above required, the said plaintiff will apply to the Court for the relief therein demanded.

Given under my hand and Seal of the District Court of the Twelfth Judicial District of the State of California, in and for the City and County of San Francisco, this 1st day of April, in the year of our Lord, one thousand eight hundred and sixty-five.

SAN FRANCISCO, SATURDAY, April 15th, 1865.

I HAVE struck a lead, and hope the readers of THE CALIFORNIAN will see my drift. It is useless to go round prospecting, chipping croppings with a hammer; one must go deep for gold. My lead is California Society. I follow it in all its dips, spurs and angles—dip into everything, spur up the laggards and look at the subject in all its aspects. The indications are rich.

I THINK it would be an admirable plan to arrest some of our city editors for contempt of court, and fine them handsomely in order to teach them that an editor has no right to try a criminal in the columns of his paper and pronounce him guilty, but should leave a jury to decide on the matter. The Call on Friday last published the following paragraph:

TRIAL OF A MURDERER BY COURT-MARTIAL.—The trial by Court-Martial of Barrega, the Spanish soldier, who murdered Wm. Niemeyer, the mate of the schooner Furber, a few weeks ago, at the "Bull Run" groggery, on Pacific street, commenced yesterday morning at the Presidio.

This trial is, if the Call be believed, a work of supererogation. Barrega is a murderer. He murdered Wm. Niemeyer at the "Bull Run" groggery. Why throw away time in trying him under these circumstances? Hang him at once! The Call states that he committed the murder, and a trial is unnecessary! The Alta has the same cool way of writing away a man's life; the Bulletin is no better. The latter, a few days ago, while the case of William Paul, master of the ship Great Republic, was still before the jury, actually published what it called "a good word" for him, manifestly intended to influence the minds of the jury in pronouncing their verdict. I believe in the freedom of the press, but cannot see wherefore in California newspapers are allowed to deliberately thwart the ends of justice, when in Europe and the Eastern States such a disreputable proceeding would subject them to a heavy fine or imprisonment. Were the press of California to observe a decent silence on the subject of the guilt or innocence of a party charged with crime until the courts had given a decision, thousands of dollars would be saved to the State, and the vexatious delay in empanelling a jury—one man after another being challenged and objected to because "he had read the newspapers"—be avoided. I think when the life of a fellow-creature is at stake, Local Items, however anxious he may be to write a "thrilling" paragraph, might sacrifice his desire to do so and follow the instincts of justice and humanity in substituting "charged with murder" for "murderer," and allowing the judge to sum up the evidence against the prisoner instead of anticipating him in his duty.

PIETY is undoubtedly a desirable thing, but advertising piety is an objectionable practice. It is not a thing to be offered for sale, as tobacco or other mercantile commodities, with the name of the brand attached. "Piety, of the old Methodist brand," "A first-class article of Baptist piety," etc., etc., do not look well in print. The following notice gleamed in the columns of the Call the other morning. It was inserted, I presume, as a little leaven with the laudable design of leavening the whole lump:

METHODIST—WANTED.—By a young woman, a situation in a pious family, (Methodist preferred); would take sole charge of children, do needle-work, or make herself useful and agreeable in any light capacity.

That young woman must be a treasure; she would take "sole charge of children"—would take charge of their blessed little souls also, I presume. She wishes to make herself useful in any "light capacity"—would act in the capacity of a shining light, of course.

Such a chance should not be lost; some Methodist family will certainly engage this pious young woman. The wages of Sin is death; per contra, the wages of Piety should be high.

THE Flag is now devoting all its energies to the Herculean labor of getting a character for the persecuted Felix O'Byrne, and a cottage for Mrs. John Brown. We fear that it will fail in the first—the Court, after fifteen days' painful and microscopic investigation, having failed to discover any indications of its existence. We hope, however, Mrs. John Brown will be provided with a home and not be condemned like the soul of her late lamented husband to go marching on, a wanderer through the State of California. Having hung her husband, America at least owes his widow a place to hang out. Let a subscription be raised to raise a fine three-story brick building in remembrance of the story of John Brown, who was an honest man and a brick in his way. We have the better half of John Brown with us still, though his body lies "mouldering in the grave;" let us, if we can afford no better, at least build her a little brown cottage. Beriah Brown would surely head the subscription in aid of his cousin's wife with a handsome sum.

THE Presidents of the six great Chinese Companies of California have struck a heavy blow at Chinese quacks. They publish a card informing their unfortunate, deluded Melian friends who rush to place themselves under the treatment of any uneducated Tartar who hangs out his shingle as doctor, that there is only one Chinese doctor in California! That is to say, there is only one who possesses a diploma, only one member of the Imperial College of Surgeons, if there be such an institution in China. How! Slop-Pot-Tea; yell, Woe, Sing Yung and all ye "other Chinese Physicians of little reputation or skill!" Even as President Lincoln hath endorsed Dr. Czapkay as the great California Physician, and sent him forth to heal those who are sick at the Courts of Europe, so hath President Yun Wo declared that Queen Fy is the great physician of China. Woe unto ye white scoundrels who have hired Chinese doctors to humbug the public, for your occupation is gone! It is no use your attempting to play your knaves, President Yun Wo has played his Queen, has won the trick, the game is in his hands.

THE Rebellion having had its last legs pretty effectually amputated, the newspapers are now beginning to publish heavy leaders about "our foreign relations." From reading these editorials I have come to the conclusion that the foreign relations they refer to are our English consins. I think that these foreign relations of ours will not be at all inclined to fight with us. If there is any fight, judging from the very complete whipping we have just given our brothers, we shall pitch into our consins in the most unscrupulous manner. However, it is to be hoped that the United States and England, will be content to cry quits, the former not holding the government responsible for the acts of ship-builders and merchants, the latter taking very little trouble to protect the interests of her subjects who responded to the cry of the South to be let a loan without considering that Uncle Sam had a lien on the cotton, which was to be the security for the money lent.

THE sweet little cherub which sits up aloft and looks out for the life of poor Jack was, in the case of the sailors of the Great Republic, a Scotch cherub. All honor to the St. Andrew's Society for the manner in which they have taken up the cause of these oppressed men. Captain Paul will no doubt be much profited by six months' imprisonment in the county jail. The mate, Coe, will, I trust, find the State prison uncomfortable, and his eighteen months' hard labor hard in reality and not in name alone. He will not, however, be compelled to exclaim every day: "Thank God, I am in the State Prison of California." Wall, cribbed, caged and confined for eighteen months within the county jail, will probably make good resolutions, and, if ever again dressed in a little brief authority, refrain from playing such fantastic tricks before high heaven as make the angels weep. I think the St. Andrew's Society have scotched a pretty nest of snakes, and earned for themselves the thanks of the community.

THE telegraph tells us that the interior is in a blaze of excitement and drygoods boxes in honor of the glorious news from the seat of the late war, (it is as well to begin early to call it the "late war.") At Aurora we are told that a meeting was held in the Court Room, where "a number of ladies were present, who joined in singing 'John Brown,' and other patriotic songs." It is, I think, open to argument, whether "John Brown" is, strictly speaking, a patriotic song or not, though some "patriots" appear to take more interest in the progress of the soul of the late John Brown, than in the "union of hearts and the union of hands," insisted upon in that truly patriotic song, "The Flag of Our Union."

WHILE the Heron stalks the stage, Hawks will grace the pulpit of Grace Cathedral. Rev. Dr. Hawks of New York has received a call from the congregation.

THE fall of Richmond was attended by a remarkable fall in provisions. Eggs which, while the city was under the beneficent rule of Davis, sold at $60 a dozen, when the city came under the Northern yoke, fell to 30 cents. This may be accounted for, perhaps, by supposing that many of the hens of Richmond remained loyal to the Union, and would not be coerced to lay eggs for traitors, or to hatch for treason. Richmond has so often been termed a foul nest of treason, that one would hardly have suspected a scarcity of eggs to have existed. The flour of Southern Chivalry was also sold very cheap, on the entrance of our troops.

POOR old Granny Alta has got into a squabble with the Democratic Press; that paper having stated that General Vega had given granny some sugar plums for espousing the Republican cause in Mexico, the poor old lady gets into a dreadful passion, and, brandishing her knitting needles at the Press, she calls him shocking had names. I am sorry that the dear old creature should forget herself so much as to make use of bad language. Fie, granny! "liar" is a very unlady-like word to use.

IT is not right to make fun of typographical errors in newspapers; be the proof-reader never so careful they will creep in. But occasionally an error of this kind is a blessing in disguise—to the paragraphist. In Wednesday's Spectator I noticed at the top of the local column an item stating that "the ticket which drew the first prize in the Fenian Gift affair was numbered 2,321." That seems appropriate—to give the fighting Fenians a "fist" prize.

THE Chinese are going into business in the most energetic manner. I notice a "Chinese Intelligence Office" advertised in the Call. The fact of the matter is that the Chinese have a good deal more intelligence than we are apt to give them credit for; Dr. Slop-Pot-Tea, though himself a "perfect cure" to look at, turns out many a perfect cure, and though he does not advertise his "institution" as established for "the suppression of quackery" is certainly injuring its professors to an immense extent.

I HAVE a little bit of news from Florence. Mrs. Agatha States, Italianized into Signora Agata Stasesi, has appeared there in Ernani, and achieved a wonderful success. We shall be proud to welcome back our wandering California States, as proud as we shall be to welcome back the erring Sister States. We shall probably next hear of Signora Agata Stasesi at the Italian Opera, London.

THERE is much talk about the distress in the interior. The travelling agent of THE CALIFORNIAN explains it by stating that a swarm of canvassers have, like locusts, swept over the land, devouring every green thing. However, as THE CALIFORNIAN circulates healthily throughout the State, the interior is rapidly recovering.

EVERY good Union man must rejoice at the glorious triumphs of the Federal arms. No less will every good Union man rejoice, the strength of those arms having been demonstrated, to see the Federal arms opened to embrace our erring brethren of the South.

CALIFORNIA'S exports are increasing every year. By the last steamer we sent to New York a remarkably fine article of California Linen.

ASMODEUS.

The fall of Richmond, and the surrender of Lee's army, were celebrated in grand style at Sacramento, Wednesday.

The residences of several citizens of Sacramento, accused of secession sympathies, were visited by the crowd of jubilant Richmond-takers, during the late rejoicing, and flags placed over them. The boys felt happy, and were determined that none should feel otherwise, whether they wished to or not.

Carson Valley is said by some petroleum-seeker to be a "basin of oil." The people over that way seem not disposed to let California get ahead of them in anything. The Carson Post says their town can grand discount the world for meanness, and if she were to bet money on it, she "would lose for betting on a dead thing."

A Gipsy camp (says the Sacramento Bee) is located on Eleventh street, near the Pacific Railroad. It consists of a small canvas tent, a large horse, two small mules, a saddle colored woman with a pipe, a villainous-looking bull-dog and four hatless children, all of a size. The Gipsy tells fortunes like a prophetess, but whips her children like "any other man."

[The following poem, written by a lady who has frequently adorned the pages of the CALIFORNIAN with her contributions, has been published in the London Public Opinion and also by a local cotemporary; but we deem it a gem of such rare excellence that we give it a new setting, taking occasion to substitute the name of the gifted authoress for the timid "L." which has hitherto been appended:]

NOT LOST.

LOST! lost!
A soul is lost!

Venturing upon the sea of Sin,
The terrible whirlpool drew it in;
And sinking unpitied and unblest,
'Twas buried—never, never to rest.
Surely it is an ungodly thought
That a grain of good should come to nought;
That a poor soul should cry out tempest-tost—
Lost! lost!

Lost! lost!
A heart is lost!

Floating upon the river of Love
In a fairy boat of fancy wove;
The downward tide bore the trusting bark
Where Despair's bleak shores rose wild and dark,
Where breakers of Passion vent their wrath,
And the quicksands of Jealousy shift the path;
And the wretched heart cried from the barren coast—
Lost! lost!

Lost? lost?
No soul is lost!
Bright gems on the breast of Beauty shine.
From the rayless caverns in the mine.
So, from the depths of the soul's despair
And Love's young heart by the tempest tost
May have Indian Summer after frost,
If we learn the Right, by the Wrong's sad cost—
We are saved—not lost.

EMILIE LAWSON.

SECOND SIGHT.

STUDY of the progress of natural and experimental science is well calculated to illustrate the aphorism about the meeting of extremes. Up to the middle of the seventeenth century, it had been the custom of philosophers to refer every unknown agency to the operation of a ghost or spirit. Evidences of this bygone tendency still remain in the modern scientific vocabulary, more especially the popular chemical vocabulary; though the causes and circumstances in which they originated are commonly forgotten. When the term "spirit of wine" falls on the ear, or it may be "spirit of salt," one is not prone to associate the word "spirit" used on such an occasion with the cognate meaning of a ghost. It had that meaning, nevertheless. The experimenter who first evolved alcohol from wine desired to make those to whom he addressed himself understand that the agent of vinous power, the beatific agent that made men merry, was a mysterious, and for that reason, to his mind, a spiritual agent; hence he called it "spirit of wine." Popular chemical nomenclature teems with kindred spiritual designations, even now. Many will occur to whatever mind imposes upon itself the task of going in quest of them; wherefore they need not be enumerated. Enough for present purposes to remark that the spiritual epoch of philosophy (for such it may well be called)—the epoch when every agency of qualities, whether partially or wholly unrevealed, was complacently referred to the dominion of a spirit—was quickly followed by another epoch, of character diametrically opposed.

Nature at length presented no secrets to the illuminati. Everything was to them explicable. Things from the explanation of which philosophers of our day would modestly retire, acknowledging such things to stand beyond the pale of their philosophy, were glibly and complacently enough explained by philosophers of the epoch to which reference is now made. Very amusing errors did these self-sufficient explanatory philosophers occasionally fall into. Everybody, one may well suppose, knows the anecdote about King Charles II. and the fish; how he puzzled the fellows of the then recently established Royal Society, by inquiring of them wherefore a dead fish should be heavier than a living fish; how the philosophers there and then accounted for it; and how, appeal to the balance having demonstrated absolute equality of weight between the two fishes, the self-sufficient philosophers were bantered by the king. Now the anecdote is of utility here, inasmuch as it is typical of the tendency amongst philosophers at a certain period—a tendency which attained its climax about the end of the seventeenth century. No question puzzled philosophers then: nothing was beyond their comprehension. Nature had no longer any secrets for these bold invaders of her outlying domains: all was explicable. In the year 1687 an anonymous book was published, entitled, "A New Treatise of Natural Philosophy, freed from the Intricacies of the Schools." Among other matters it contained an explanation of the way in which a basilisk kills people by looking at them. At this time we have got rid of the fabled basilisk; the creature that was reputed to kill by the mere pugnacity of his eye-glances. The creature is now known to be a myth, and the cases of sudden death, which happened reputedly from the eye-glances of a basilisk, suggest more probable—if not, indeed, well-established—causes. But our author not only has no manner of doubt as to the existence of basilisks, but he explains quite glibly how it happens that the eye-glances of a creature should acquire such deadly power.

Now it happens that the progress of modern science, in eliminating the basilisk from out the list of created things, has at the same time explained the cause of belief in that fabled creature. When the circumstance is made known that the favored dwelling-place of basilisks, according to the testimony of authorities who vouched for the being of such creatures, was at the bottom of dried-up wells, pits and caverns, the modern reader will begin to suspect that the sudden deaths referred by mediæval writers to basilisk gaze were really caused by inhalation of carbonic acid gas. When, furthermore, we learn, on the authority of the book above quoted, that a certain inquisitive student of nature's ways, having protected his eyes with a pair of spectacles, managed once upon a time to scow a basilisk from head to tail, to gaze unharmed into the creature's very eyes, making a deliberate survey of the beast, and recording that he resembled in appearance a big toad, then does the ridiculous suspicion dawn upon one that the creature mistaken for the deadly thing, of mediæval fancy bred, was no other than a poor frog! Our author, however—the natural philosopher—explains the matter in quite another way. According to him, the spectacles had a positive value; so that without the spectacles no mortal eyes could have met the basilisk gaze without instant death to the possessor of them. According to our authority (who is a staunch believer, as we already know, in the deadly power of basilisk eyes,) the explanation of their potency consists in simply this, viz., the continuous darting, by a sort of radiation, as we should call it now, of certain sharp and penetrative emanations; atomic darts, purely mechanical things: whence the rationale of their action should, of course, be purely mechanical. The reader will doubtless call to mind how that greatest of travellers, Lemuel Gulliver (if M. Du Chailu be excepted,) finding himself in the midst of battle waged by Lilliputian warriors, seeing the tiny arrows fly about, and fearing lest his eyes might be injured, put on his spectacles to ward the arrows off. Precisely after that manner was it that, according to our authority, the adventurous individual who dared the basilisk in his cave protected himself against that creature.

These remarks were instituted to the end of showing how philosophers, over-arrogant in their own conceit—blinded, metaphorically so to speak, by the pride of their own self knowledge—have been known to explain phenomena to the satisfaction of the public, although hardly, it may fairly be assumed, to the satisfaction of themselves; or how, if indeed satisfied, they must have been content to deposit their faith on a pedestal of insecure erection and very small dimensions. Coming to the main topic of this paper, the faculty, or delusion, or pretence of second sight, I perceive that certain individuals, led away by the pride of their own philosophy, have curiously, and, as it would seem, illogically, assumed that apparitions, belonging to the category of the second sight, are explicable on a purely physical hypothesis; the phenomena of such apparitions presenting no more difficulty to the inquirer than those of the Polytechnic ghost. Now it is one thing to admit that long contemplation of wreathing Highland fogs may have exalted the Celtic mind to the condition of excitement necessary for feigning out of these vaporous emanations, corpses wrapped in winding-sheets, and other portentous visions of second sight; but it is altogether another thing to assume that such manifestations are merely the result of reflective and refractive phenomena. Moreover, if candidly investigated, neither hypothesis accords with actual testimony in regard to this matter. Whatever opinion may now be held concerning the reality or unreality of second sight, whether we choose to consider it a faculty possessed by certain individuals to whom extraordinary glimpses of the spirit-world are given, or whether we choose to look upon it as a delusion, bred of hypochondriasis, Highland fog, and the fumes of Highland whisky, there still remains no doubt but that the testimony favorable to the reality of second sight is both multifarious and precise. There is a speciality, too, as regards evidence affecting this matter; the speciality of appeal to the result, as confirmatory of the spectral appearances. Perhaps this is the most extraordinary particular noticeable in records of second sight. It is not merely that a seer, or one possessing the faculty of second sight, should vaguely protest that he observed a certain apparition not seen by others: such protestation, according to published testimony on this matter—and it is very voluminous—would not have constituted one a "seer" in the estimation of his fellows. There was a precision in this branch of demonology, which modern spirit-rapping sadly lacks: a fearless appeal to confirmatory results, suggestive of complete honesty on the part of the seer; and, strange to say—if I am to believe my authorities—which the future has made manifest in thousands of recorded instances. There is a precision, a particularity about these published examples of second sight, not a little embarrassing to one who would desire to eliminate from his own mind any preconceived beliefs inquired of the woman the meaning of such an unbecoming and distracted action; whereupon she told him it was to prevent her maid seeing visions; and it fell out accordingly, for which it might have entertained, and submit his guidance wholly to the directing hand of testimony. Now the testimony, I repeat, affecting the matter of second sight, is most precise and particular: every ground of error seems to have been cleared away, every cause of deception eliminated. We do not find that Mr. Dash or Mrs. Blank saw a corpse lying near her on a certain blank day of a year undetermined; and that before the year was out somebody happened to die, not a hundred miles from the scene of the apparition; but we are circumstantially informed concerning the personal identity of the visionary corpse. Moreover, the lapse of time between the spectral apparition and the death it portended was, according to the authorities before me, infallibly predicted within small limits of error. It had come to be understood by these second-sight seers, that the winding-sheet which seemed to enwrap these spectral corpses disclosed, through the manner of its folding, the period of dissolution. If a spectral corpse was seen wholly enveloped by the winding-sheet, then the death had already happened, or would immediately happen. If the winding-sheet only extended halfway up the body, then death would occur after the lapse of half a year.

The antiquarian, John Aubrey, wishing to collate authentic testimony relative of the faculty of second sight, proposed a series of questions to two Scotch gentlemen thereon, and published their replies. The respondents do not differ in any important particular: both testify, to begin, that the second sight relates to things future, which will shortly come to pass; that sad and dismal events are the objects of this faculty, such as sudden deaths and dreadful accidents. Having intimated that the general characteristic of second sight is dismal—melancholy—deponent number one then states that he only knew of one instance to the contrary; "That instance," remarks he, "I have from a person worthy of credit, and it is this:

"Near forty years ago, Maclean and his lady, sister to my Lord Seaforth, were walking about their own house, and on their return both came into a chamber where the young child was nursed. The baby did as babies sometimes do now; it began to cry; whereupon the nurse was asked whether baby was well, and whether anything had gone wrong with its diet. 'Well, and well victualled,' replied the nurse; 'it crieth not for the cause of sickness.' 'Then why does it cry?' demanded the questioner; upon which the nurse, after a few moments of discreet silence, communicated the reason, and in so doing made known her faculty of second sight. 'Maclean (baby's papa) would die,' the nurse said, 'and the lady would shortly be married to another man.' Being pressed as to how she knew that event, she told the questioners (there were two,) that on their entrance into the room, she saw a man with a scarlet cloak and a white hat betwixt them, giving the lady a kiss over the shoulder; and thus it was that baby cried. All this came to pass after Maclean's death. The tutor of Lovet married the lady in the same habit the nurse saw him in."

Such, then, is the solitary instance of a result, not sad, not dismal, not melancholy, made known by anticipation through the faculty of second sight. Deponent number one, still enlightening the English antiquarian Aubrey on the subject of second sight, goes on to state that "second-sighted men see things visibly before their eye, but none sees but themselves; for example, if a man be doomed to be hanged, they will see him already dangling from a gibbet, or at least a rope about his neck: if to be beheaded, they will see him headless; if to be drowned, they will perceive an apparition of him in water; if to die suddenly by undetermined means, they will see a winding-sheet about his head. One instance I had from a gentleman here," states deponent, "of a Highland gentleman of the Macdonalds, who having a brother who came to visit him, saw him coming in wanting a head, but told not his brother that he saw any such thing; yet within twenty-four hours thereafter his brother was taken (being a murderer,) his head cut off, and sent to Edinburgh. Many such instances might be given."

The faculty of second sight was described by all whom deponent questioned on the matter as a troublesome thing; they would be gladly freed from it, but could not. He confesses, however, to having heard "lately" of a man very much troubled in his soul therewith, from whom, by his seriously praying deliverance, the faculty at length departed.

Relative to the exorcism of second-sight spectres, to getting rid of the faculty, I find, in Martin's tract on second sight the following anecdote:

"A woman of Stornabay, in Lewis, had a mind who saw visions, and often fell into a swoon. Her mistress was very much concerned about her, but could not find out any means to prevent her seeing these things: at last she resolved to pour some of the water used in baptism on her maid's face, believing this would prevent her seeing any more sights of the kind. Accordingly, she carried her maid with her the next Lord's day, and both of them sat near the basin in which the water stood, and after baptism, before the minister had concluded the last prayer, she put out her hand in the basin, took up as much water as she could, and threw it upon the maid's face, at which strange action the minister and the congregation were equally surprised. After prayer, the minister from that time she never once more saw a vision of any kind. This account was given me by Mr. Morison, minister of the place, before several of his parishioners who knew the truth of it." Then follows a comment that the reader is requested to note. "I submit the matter of fact," our author adds, "to the censure of the learned; but for my own part I think it to have been one of Satan's devices to make credulous people have an esteem for holy water."

One of the questions proposed by the antiquarian Aubrey was this—Had any person or persons truly godly, or who might justly be presumed to be such, been known to have this gift or faculty? To this query respondent answers, "Not any godly, but such as are virtuous."

That it descends by succession deponent cannot learn. Nor can he learn how possessors of the faculty came by it. "They will not tell, which if they did, they are sure of their strokes from an invisible hand." He cites, as an example, the case of one Allen Miller, "who being in company with some gentlemen, and having gotten more than ordinary of that strong liquor they were drinking, began to tell stories about strange passages he had been at; but the said Allen was suddenly removed to the further end of the house, and was there almost strangled. Recovering a little, and coming to the place where he was before, they asked him what it was that troubled him. He answered he durst not tell, for he had told too much already."

As to the source whence second-sighted individuals derived their faculty, some attributed the gift to a compact with the devil, others to fairies: deponent hath heard that those that have this faculty of second sight have offered to teach it to such as were curious to know it. "Upon such and such conditions they would teach them," but their offers were rejected.

Deponent having furnished answers to all the questions propounded, concludes his epistle to John Aubrey, F. R. S., by the recital of a case narrated to him "by a very honest man in the next parish, who told it to me," deponent himself. The outline of the tale is as follows: The honest man's wife being in a fair way to increase his family, he bought some boards with which to make a bed for her. The boards still lying at the door of his house, there comes an old fishwoman, yet alive, and asks him whose were those boards. "My own," said he. "For what use hast thou them?" demanded she. "For a bed," said he. "I tell thee they shall be for a coffin," the fish-fag muttered; "for already do I see a corpse lying upon them." Thereupon the honest man was stricken to the heart, fearing the death of his wife. The old hag, having muttered her prediction, goes away; and presently the honest man sends for a carpenter to make the bed, which is accordingly done. It was baby, not wife, who died, my authority goes on to say; and out of the ends of the boards was made its little coffin.

It must not be imagined, in spite of the statements in this epistle to John Aubrey, that second-sight apparitions have only been vouchsafed to enlighten people on matters so serious as these of life and death; on the contrary, such trivialities as a broken pate, ducking in a puddle, and a forehead blood-soiled, but not damaged, have, according to another authority now before me—one who wrote under the pseudonym of "Insulanus"—been deemed worthy this mode of revelation; in proof of which the following:

"A gentleman, who is a native of Skye, did when a boy disoblige a Seer in the Isle of Rasay, and upbraid him for his ugliness, as being black by name and black by nature. At last the Seer told him, very angrily: 'My child, if I am black, you'll be red ere long.' The master of the family chid him for this, and bade him give over his foolish predictions, since nobody believed them; but next morning the boy, being at play near the houses, fell on a stone and wounded himself in the forehead so deep that to this day there's a hollow scar in that part of it."

"James Beaton, surgeon in the Isle of North Uist, told me [i. e., "Insulanus,"] that being in the Isle of Mull, a seer told him confidently that he was shortly to have a bloody forehead; but he disregarded it and called the seer a fool. However, this James being called to some of the MacLeans to go along with them to attack a vessel belonging to the Earl of Argyle, who was then coming to possess Mull by force, they attacked the vessel; and one of the MacLeans, being wounded, the said James, while dressing the wound, happened to rub his forehead, and then some of the patient's blood sticking to his face accomplished the presage."

But of all the sorry violations of the Horatian maxim, "Nec intersit Deus nisi," take the following, on the authority of our scribe, "Insulanus."

"Mary Campbell, a woman of acknowledged probity and candor, states that when she was a young girl, living in her father's house upon the Isle of Scalpa, there was a notable old seer, one Evander MacMhaoldonoh, a domestic in the family, who by the second sight foretold several events which punctually came to pass, and in particular that Kenneth Campbell, her brother, being on a jaunt in the Lewes, and as he was returning home, accompanied by his servant, whom he had sent upon an errand to a village at some distance, as the said Kenneth was solitarily coming on his way, he found himself seized with a faintishness, which so gained upon him that he was obliged to crawl upon all fours, through mires and puddles, to a desolate cottage, where he remained that night, and after a sound sleep recovered of his ailment. The old seer that night seemed frettish; and being asked the reason of his being so much out of humor, told that the said Kenneth Campbell was not at his ease, and that he observed him by the second sight in a very distressed condition, his clothes being puddled, and all bespattered with filth and mud: which upon his return to the family next day he himself declared to have been literally true, according to the above prediction."

It may be that my readers will agree with me in the opinion that a sufficient number of examples have been quoted, by way of illustrating what is meant by second sight. The records of this faculty, illusion, hallucination, or whatever we may choose to call it, present a general similarity, one that renders a multiplicity of illustrative cases needless; and without cogent need one is glad to put aside the musty records of phantom corpses borne on biers, when it happens, as to the writer now, that the small hours of morning are entered upon, and the mystery of silence and solitude prevails. "Explain to us this mystery of second sight," do some phantom voices command me, whispering from yonder corner? No. I promised not that. Is it not enough to cite one's authorities? Are they not circumstantial and precise? Whether to believe or disbelieve is a question that each individual before whom this abstract may come must decide for himself. To believe nothing beyond reason is a failing of very contracted minds—one to which the very consciousness of our individual existence should be a standing reproof. The belief in things contrary to reason, always assuming reason to have been restricted to the sphere of its own competence, is another matter quite. Whether second sight be a thing beyond reason contrary to reason is a question, the corresponding answer to which would need the opening of much new ground of debate, and moreover would lead the writer to an arena of strife which he would rather avoid.—J. Scoffern, M.B.

GOSSIP ON ART, MUSIC, Etc.

AT HOME.

An effort is again being made to have the Astor Library opened in the evening.

A movement is on foot in Boston to erect a statue of Hon. Edward Everett. Over $20,000 have already been contributed toward the enterprise.

James Miller, of New York, announces the Sonnets of Shakspeare, edited by a distinguished General, high in command (name not divulged,) and author of several popular works, with copious remarks and references.

Good books on American Ornithology are hardly to be had for love or money. Audubon and Wilson cost a fortune, and Nuttall's and Brewer's Wilson are out of print and the plates destroyed.

The statue of Hon. Horace Mann, which is to be placed in front of the State House, in Boston, will be completed early in the summer, and it is said the work of preparing the pedestal would be commenced in the spring, as soon as the frost was out of the ground.

The Brooklyn Art Association has completed its plans, for the erection of a new gallery, and in conjunction with the Philharmonic Society will purchase the lots adjoining the Academy of Music, and erect thereon a building suitable for their joint purposes.

The City Council of Newport, R. I., have voted to erect a monument to the memory of the late Maj.-Gen. Isaac I. Stevens, who was killed at the battle of Chantilly, September 1, 1862. It is to be of granite, with a molded base, supporting a shaft twenty-one feet high, and is to cost about $1,600.

Simmons, the sculptor, is now in Washington, modelling busts of our distinguished men. He has had sittings from Vice Admiral Farragut, Gen. Banks and Gen. Augur, and is to model busts of Gens. Grant and Meade, and also of the President and his Cabinet. He went to City Point and had several sittings from Gen. Grant.

ABROAD.

Wm. Vincent Wallace, lately reported as in a dying condition, is in a state of convalescence.

A new journal is to be started in Turin to be called Il Conte Cavour.

The Sultan has ordered the Emperor's Life of Napoleon to be translated into English.

The Pope intends to create a new department in the Vatican Museum, to be entirely devoted to bronze statues.

Rossini gave a soiree musicale last month, at which the attraction is to be an original duo written by him expressly for Patti and Bellini.

The tomb of William Button, a Bishop of Bath and Wells, famous for his sanctity in the 13th century, has just been discovered by some workmen in Wells Cathedral.

A fine portrait of S. T. Coleridge, the poet, by his friend Washington Allston, the poet-painter, has been secured for the National Portrait Gallery of England.

The Presse states that the pictures and curious objects of art forming the collection of the Count de Chambord, will shortly be sold in Paris.

Three thousand five hundred and three new works were published in England last year. 715 were religious, 842 fiction, 565 poetry, etc., and 166 new papers and annuals.

The old convents of Mexico are being ransacked by French bookworms. Several valuable prizes have already been found, it is said. A vocabulary of the Maya language among others.

The new periodical edited by Henry Mayhew is out. It is called the Shops of London, and is a history of the trades and manufactures of Great Britain.

Mr. Ruskin resumes his contributions to literature in the Art Journal. He calls his new series the "Cestus of Anglaia"—the goddess of three graces who is claimed as the patroness of impersonation of painting.

The rehearsals of "L'Africaine" at the grand opera in Paris, were proceeding with lightning speed. All the scenes are painted save those of the third act. It was to have been produced by February 15th.

Joseph Court, the historical painter and director of the Museum at Rouen, died in Paris, aged 67. He was the son of a hair-dresser, but by his own genius raised himself to the level of the greatest painters of France.

Gounod has finished his musical adjuncts to Legouve's new tragic play which Ristori is to produce on the 15th of March, in Paris. It is called The Two Queens. Gounod's choruses are spoken of in the highest terms.

The Roman Pontifical Academy of Archaeology has decided that the colossal statue of Hercules, in gilt bronze discovered in the theatre at Pompeii, shall henceforth adorn the Vatican, and bear the name of the Ercole del Mastai, in memory of Pius IX.

Gibson, the sculptor, who has accumulated a large fortune by his art, announces his intention to bequeath to the Royal Academy, at his death, a sum of $233,000, on condition that that body should fit up and keep in perpetuity three moderate sized rooms for the reception of the casts of all the testator's works.

The beautiful Church of St. Maclou, at Rouen has been seriously injured by the great storm of the 13th of January last. A portion of the steeple, which tourists will remember as one of the finest specimens of the florid architecture of the fifteenth century, was blown down, and fell into the nave.

It is asserted in Parisian journals that the original score of Don Giovanni, in four books, written in Mozart's own hand, has been discovered in the archives of the opera at Prague, where this opera was originally produced in 1787. If this is the case, is the copy which Madame Viardot has, and which was so long claimed to be the original, a forgery?

A wonderful story is being told of a classical Scotchman who now haunts the students' quarter in Paris, and earns a livelihood by singing Latin songs, and translating Tacitus to eager audiences, which crowd round the gutters in which he "stands and delivers" his songs and sentiments, raining sous on him as he ends.

The London Review publishes a letter from Dr. William Bell, the object of which is to show that Shakspeare was in Germany during what are called "the three missing years of his life," viz., from 1586 to 1589, and that he there attained some knowledge of the German language, and found in old German dramas and legends the materials for many of his plays.

The English copyright of Napoleon's Life of Cesar sold for £1,600. It has leaked out, through some of the type-setters or proof-readers, that it is as wearisome as the Great Desert, and will be utterly unreadable. The Sultan has given orders for its translation into the Turkish language as soon as it appears—a delicate compliment which will be appreciated. The work will not bear the Emperor's name on the title page.

The Bodleian Library at Oxford has just got another treasure in the shape of a new autograph of Shakspeare. It is written in faded ink on the title page of a small octavo Aldine edition of "Ovid's Metamorphoses" (1502.) The signature is abridged into "Wm. Shr.;" the Athenæum adds that "it is at once evident that unless it is a forgery, the hand which wrote it was that which signed the will of Shakspeare;" and the signature is corroborated by that of the owner in 1682, who has written within the cover, "This little book of Ovid was given to me by W. Hall, who said it was once Will. Shakspeare's."

A sad affair has happened in Paris. A. M. Tandou, chief classical editor of the leading French publishing firm, Hachette & Co., was married in May, 1863, as it seemed, very happily. He was rich, industrious, clever, and everything seemed to smile on him. Seven months after his marriage, his wife left him and took refuge with her father, declaring that her husband's violence rendered it impossible for her to live with him. This accusation Tandou always denied, and declared that when the application for a judicial separation should be made he would be able to disprove the charge. Contrary to his expectation, the Court decreed the separation. Shortly afterwards, Tandou was found hanging in his room dead. Before committing suicide he had written a letter to his wife declaring that he could not endure his despair.

THE ADVENTURE OF PADRE VICENTIO.

A LEGEND OF SAN FRANCISCO.

ONE pleasant New Year's Eve, about forty years ago, Padre Vicentio was slowly picking his way across the sand-hills from the Mission Dolores. As he climbed the crest of the ridge beside Mission Creek his broad, shining face might have been easily mistaken for the beneficent image of the rising moon, so bland was its smile and so indefinite its features. For the padre was a man of notable reputation and character: his ministrations at the Mission of San Jose had been marked with cordiality and unction; he was adored by the simple-minded savages, and had succeeded in impressing his individuality so strongly upon them that the very children were said to have miraculously resembled him in feature.

As the holy man reached the loneliest portion of the road, he naturally put spurs to his mule as if to quicken that decorous pace which the obedient animal had acquired through long experience of its master's habits. The locality had an unfavorable reputation. Sailors—deserters from whaleships—had been seen lurking about the outskirts of the town, and the low scrub oaks which everywhere beset the trail might have easily concealed some desperate runaway. Besides these material obstructions, the devil, whose hostility to the church was well known, was said to sometimes haunt the vicinity in the likeness of a spectral whaler, who had met his death in a drunken bout, from a harpoon in the hands of a companion. The ghost of this unfortunate mariner was frequently observed sitting on the hill toward the dusk of evening, armed with his favorite weapon and a tub containing a coil of line, looking out for some belated traveller on whom to exercise his professional skill. It is related that the good father José Maria of the Mission Dolores had been twice attacked by this phantom sportsman; that once, on returning from San Francisco, and panting with exertion from climbing the hill, he was startled by a stentorian cry of "There she blows!" quickly followed by a hurrying harpoon, which buried itself in the sand beside him; that on another occasion he narrowly escaped destruction, his serape having been transfixed by the diabolical harpoon and dragged away in triumph. Popular opinion seems to have been divided as to the reason for the devil's particular attention to Father José, some asserting that the extreme piety of the padre excited the Evil One's animosity, and others that his adipose tendency simply rendered him from a professional view-point a profitable capture.

Had Father Vicentio been inclined to scoff at this apparition as an heretical innovation, there was still the story of Concepcion, the Demon Vaquero, whose terrible riata was fully as potent as the whaler's harpoon. Concepcion, when in the flesh, had been a celebrated herder of cattle and wild horses, and was reported to have chased the devil in the shape of a fleet pinto colt all the way from San Luis Obispo to San Francisco, vowing not to give up the chase until he had overtaken the disguised Arch-Enemy. This the devil prevented by resuming his own shape, but kept the unfortunate vaquero to the fulfilment of his rash vow; and Concepcion still scoured the coast on a phantom steed, beguiling the monotony of his eternal pursuit by lassoing travellers, dragging them at the heels of his unbroken mustang until they were eventually picked up, half-strangled, by the road-side. The padre listened attentively for the tramp of this terrible rider. But no footfall broke the stillness of the night; even the hoofs of his own mule sank noiselessly in the shifting sand. Now and then a rabbit bounded lightly by him or a quail ran into the brush. The melancholy call of plover from the adjoining marshes of Mission Creek came to him so faintly and fitfully that it seemed almost a recollection of the past rather than a reality of the present.

To add to his discomposure one of those heavy sea fogs peculiar to the locality began to drift across the hills and presently encompassed him. While endeavoring to evade its cold embraces, Padre Vicentio incautiously drove his heavy spurs into the flanks of his mule as that puzzled animal was hesitating on the brink of a steep declivity. Whether the poor beast was indignant at this novel outrage, or had been for some time reflecting on the evils of being priest-ridden, has not transpired; enough that he suddenly threw up his heels, pitching the reverend man over his head, and, having accomplished this feat, coolly dropped on his knees and tumbled after his rider.

Over and over went the padre, closely followed by his faithful mule. Luckily the little hollow which received the pair was of sand that yielded to the superincumbent weight, half burying them without further injury. For some moments the poor man lay motionless, vainly endeavoring to collect his scattered senses. A hand irreverently laid upon his collar and a rough shake assisted to recall his consciousness. As the padre staggered to his feet he found himself confronted by a stranger.

Seen dimly through the fog, and under circumstances that to say the least were not prepossessing, the new comer had an inexpressibly mysterious and brigand-like aspect. A long boat-cloak concealed his figure, and a slouched hat hid his features, permitting only his eyes to glisten in the depths. With a deep groan the padre slipped from the stranger's grasp and subsided into the soft sand again.

"Gad's life!" said the stranger, pettishly, "hast no more bones in thy fat carcass than a jelly-fish? Lend a hand, here! Yo, heave ho!" and he dragged the padre into an upright position. "Now, then, who and what art thou?"

The padre could not help thinking that the question might have more properly been asked by himself; but with an odd mixture of dignity and trepidation he began enumerating his different titles, which were by no means brief, and would have been alone sufficient to strike awe in the bosom of an ordinary adversary. The stranger irreverently broke in upon his formal phrases, and assuring him that a priest was the very person he was looking for, coolly replaced the old man's hat, which had tumbled off, and bade him accompany him at once on an errand of spiritual counsel to one who was even then lying in extremity. "To think," said the stranger, "that I should stumble upon the very man I was seeking! Body of Bacchus! but this is lucky. Follow me quickly, for there is no time to lose."

Like most easy natures the positive assertion of the stranger, and withal a certain authoritative air of command, overcame what slight objections the padre might have feebly nurtured during this remarkable interview. The spiritual invitation was one, also, that he dared not refuse; not only that; but it tended somewhat to remove the superstitious dread with which he had begun to regard the mysterious stranger. Following at a respectful distance the padre could not help observing with a thrill of horror that the stranger's footsteps made no impression on the sand, and his figure seemed at times to blend and incorporate itself with the fog, until the holy man was obliged to wait for its reappearance. In one of these intervals of embarrassment he heard the ringing of the far-off Mission bell, proclaiming the hour of midnight. Scarcely had the last stroke died away before the announcement was taken up and repeated by a multitude of bells of all sizes, and the air was filled with the sound of striking clocks and the pealing of steeple chimenes. The old man uttered a cry of alarm. The stranger sharply demanded the cause. "The bells! did you not hear them?" gasped Padre Vicentio. "Tush! tush!" answered the stranger, "thy fall hath set triple bob-majors ringing in thine ears. Come on!"

The padre was only too glad to accept the explanation conveyed in this discourteous answer. But he was destined for another singular experience. When they had reached the summit of the eminence now known as Russian Hill, an exclamation again burst from the padre. The stranger turned to his companion with an impatient gesture; but the padre heeded him not. The view that burst upon his sight was such as might well have engrossed the attention of a more enthusiastic nature. The fog had not yet reached the hill, and the long valleys and hillsides of the embarcadero below were glittering with the light of a populous city. "Look!" said the padre, stretching his hand over the spreading landscape. "Look, dost thou not see the stately squares and brilliantly-lighted avenues of a mighty metropolis. Dost thou not see, as it were, another firmament below?"

"Avast heaving, reverend man, and quit this folly," said the stranger, dragging the bewildered padre after him. "Behold rather the stars knocked out of thy hollow noddle by the fall thou hast had. Prithee, get over thy visions and rhapsodies, for the time is nearing apace."

The padre humbly followed without another word. Descending the hill toward the north, the stranger leading the way, in a few moments the padre detected the wash of waves, and presently his feet struck the firmer sand of the beach. Here the stranger paused, and the padre perceived a boat lying in readiness hard by. As he stepped into the stern-sheets, in obedience to the command of his companion, he noticed that the rowers seemed to partake of the misty incorporeal texture of his companion, a similarity that became the more distressing when he also perceived that their oars in pulling together made no noise. The stranger, assuming the helm, guided the boat on quietly, while the fog, settling over the face of the water and closing around them, seemed to interpose a muffled wall between themselves and the rude jarring of the outer world. As they pushed further into this penitential, the padre listened anxiously for the sound of creaking blocks and the rattling of cordage, but no vibration broke the veiled stillness or disturbed the warm breath of the fleecy fog. Only one incident occurred to break the monotony of their mysterious journey. A one-eyed rower, who sat in front of the padre, catching the devout father's eye, immediately grinned such a ghastly smile, and winked his remaining eye with such diabolical intensity of meaning that the padre was constrained to utter a pious ejaculation, which had the disastrous effect of causing the marine Cocker to "catch a crab," throwing his heels in the air and his head into the bottom of the boat.

But even this accident did not disturb the gravity of the rest of the ghastly boat's crew.

When, as it seemed to the padre, ten minutes had elapsed, the outline of a large ship loomed up directly across their bow. Before he could utter the cry of warning that rose to his lips, or brace himself against the expected shock, the boat passed gently and noiselessly through the sides of the vessel, and the holy man found himself standing on the berth deck of what seemed to be an ancient caravel. The boat and boat's crew had vanished. Only his mysterious friend, the stranger, remained. By the light of a swinging lamp the padre beheld him standing beside a hammock, whereon, apparently, lay the dying man to whom he had been so mysteriously summoned. As the padre, in obedience to a sign from his companion, stepped to the side of the sufferer, he feebly opened his eyes and thus addressed him:

"Thou seest before thee, reverend father, a helpless mortal, struggling not only with the last agonies of the flesh, but beaten down and tossed with sore anguish of the spirit. It matters little when or how I became what thou now seest me. Enough that my life has been ungodly and sinful, and that my only hope of thy absolution lies in my imparting to thee a secret which is of vast importance to the holy Church, and affects greatly her power, wealth and dominion on these shores. But the terms of this secret and the conditions of my absolution are peculiar. I have but five minutes to live. In that time I must receive the extreme unction of the Church."

"And thy secret?" said the holy father.

"Shall be told afterward," answered the dying man.

"Come, my time is short. Shrive me quickly."

The padre hesitated. "Couldst thou not tell this secret first?"

"Impossible!" said the dying man, with what seemed to the padre a momentary gleam of triumph. Then as his breath grew feebler he called impatiently, "Shrive me! shrive me!"

"Let me know at least what this secret concerns?" suggested the padre, insinuatingly.

"Shrive me first," said the dying man.

But the priest still hesitated, parleying with the sufferer until the ship's bell struck, when, with a triumphant, mocking laugh from the stranger, the vessel suddenly fell to pieces, and the rushing of waters which at once involved the dying man, the priest, and the mysterious stranger.

The padre did not recover his consciousness until high noon the next day, when he found himself lying in a little hollow between the Mission hills, and his faithful mule a few paces from him, cropping the sparse herbage. The padre made the best of his way home, but wisely abstained from narrating the facts mentioned above, until after the discovery of gold, when the whole of this veracious incident was related, with the assertion of the padre that the secret which was thus mysteriously snatched from his possession was nothing more than the discovery of gold, years since, by the runaway sailors from the expedition of Sir Francis Drake.

ATLANTIC GOSSIP.

[CORRESPONDENCE OF THE CALIFORNIAN.]

NEW YORK, February 28, 1865.

AMONG the small items of scandal is one referring to a prominent Philadelphia poet. He was found at the Continental Hotel, enjoying the society of a married lady, very much after the fashion of Francesca di Rimini and her enamored brother-in-law. A tableau ensued straightway, when the lady's husband entered; the latter was far beyond his wife's years, and did not know that youth combined with poesy could rob him of all his life held dear. He is reported at this writing to be midway between the Insane Asylum and the Divorce Court.

The more I live in the world the older I grow in the doctrine of Genesis, that all the thoughts of men's hearts are only evil and that continually; but I except the man who gave Buchanan Read, the other day, a house in the Quaker City which cost $25,000. Whether it was Joseph Harrison or the merchant Clayborn I do not know, but the fact is certain. The donor had already bought for Read a country house, but the poet-artist being gregarious, refused to isolate himself far from the sweet society of streets, so the giver substituted for the villa a city residence. Read is a good drinker, but as he pays his debts and is honorable, I won't mention it. He has the good luck of having many friends; as a painter he is quite bad. Old Nicholas Longworth, his befriender, met him once in the streets of Cincinnati, and said:

"Tom, that was a fine poem of yours, this morning, in the paper; you are a first-rate poet, but a confounded bad painter."

I think that Read is a splendid lyricist and balladist, but his pastorals and epics are strained and ridiculous. Ticknor & Fields engross unfairly the poetical publications of consequence. Carleton, their sometime rival, has gone to Havana for his health. Carleton is a young man of say thirty-five, and quite accomplished. He sings creditably, and plays billiards like a great chief. But I do not think that he conducts the publishing with sufficient dignity, but sensationally, as we publish papers and raise armies.

Hurd & Houghton appear to be looking up; at present they publish for incipient authors, at the expense of the latter, but have wonderful typographies. Some three years ago I visited those great presses, the Riverside and the University, at Cambridge, near Boston; the latter occupies the same building where the first book was published in Massachusetts. It stands opposite to the Harvard grounds, and not far from Charles River.

A young fellow named George Alfred Townsend has two books almost ready, a translation of Manou Lescant, by the Abbe Prevost, and a series of European papers to be entitled The War Correspondent in Europe. Townsend has been known, of late, as "Alfred Trample," but I have found him out, having facilities unsurpassed for so doing; he used to be the feuilletonist in Philadelphia, and superceded Dr. R. Shelton Mackenzie in the literary and dramatic management of the Press, but went over to New York, rode a horse with McClellan and Pope in their two melancholy campaigns, and finally shied over to Europe, where he staid twenty-two months. His English literary experiences have been told in Harper's Magazine, but his book of the war correspondent abroad will exemplify representative Americanism in contrast with European institutions, manners and arts. Townsend is about twenty-four years of age, and I, for one, hope he will do well.

The "Orpheus C. Kerr" papers are to be recommenced soon, I understand, in the Leader. Since Fiske has become absolute in this weekly paper, he has expurgated much of its coarse partisanship, written a better dramatic summary than Clapp ever did, and added a lot of fine new writers to its staff. The Leader has in it the making of a great concern. Apropos of Fiske, I may say that the Count Joannes has sued him personally for libel. This suit was commenced at the instigation of a personal enemy, whom Fiske had superceded in the editorial chair. With a depth of gall never realized in the profession, the discharged person went to Court and made an affidavit that Fiske has libelled Joannes. The fact was true, but the honor of making it known strikes me as the meanest thing I ever read of.

The mother-in-law of Edgar A. Poe, Mrs. Clemm, is living in great destitution in Baltimore, at a charity hospital. N. P. Willis and the young men who write for nothing for his paper, recently sent her a small subscription; the poor creature has given away every relic of Poe, the last being a pair of tongs to curl whiskers! and a small smelling bottle, which a Brooklyn manager obtained. Poe wrote The Raven in a little hut north of Central Park, in Westchester county. When he left Mrs. Clemm to go to Richmond, the old lady burst into tears: "I shall never see you again, Edgar," she said. A few days afterward, Poe was a dishonored corpse. Still, I am not one of those who wish that his life had been otherwise. Literature and character are better illustrated by Poe, as Fate and himself made him, rather than as society would have moulded him. Good men have no uses if there are no bad ones. All the world is a succession of contrasts.

Have you seen the excellent exposé of the Count George (Joannes) Jones in his suit for libel against Horace Greeley? I mention his non-suit merely to show how much genealogical love we have floating around in this republican country. Messrs. Kapp, Dwight and Leiber were called upon the stand to prove the impossibility of the titleship of a count being legitimately conferred by an ambassador, as Jones asserts his was. They established a converseance with feudal and titulary law which astonished me. Old Dr. Leiber is probably the greatest publicist in America. I see him frequently at the Century Club—a fat, genial, careless old character, who is at present absorbed in a mooted celebration of the fifth hundred birthday of Dante, which will probably be held at the Club Rooms. The Century affords some fine intellectual perspectives of Saturday nights, when the best artists, art-patrons, litterateurs and scholars are assembled, cooking their own oysters or sipping grateful toddies. Yonder is Bayard Taylor, tall, athletic, handsome, wearing becoming spectacles, but supple like an undergraduate. Close by is Church the painter, pale, cold and raven-haired, and next to him Launt Thompson the sculptor, with a marked face and kindly address, talking to Edwin Booth, whose noble head shows proudest even here where all are great-brained, except some dozen or two score, who stand for patron, and buy the pictures they do not understand. The two fine salons of the place are furnished with capital works of art, the most noticeable of which is Louis Lang's "Twelfth Night," which gives portraits of all the members in a Shakspearian procession. There is also a splendid engraving of Paul de la Roche's grand fresco in the Ecole des Beaux Arts, and on the stairway is Ward's "Ethiop" in plaster. The Century Club is by all odds the finest association of professional gentlemen in America. Its house is upon Fifteenth street, and is very spacious and ornate.

Yours truly,

[DESULTORY.

HOLY WEEK IN JERUSALEM.

[THE penitential season of the Christian Church having this week been drawn to a close, it may be interesting to many readers to learn how the week is celebrated, and with what solemnity the anniversary of the Saviour's death is observed in the land wherein the blessed Nazarene suffered and died for the sins of mankind. The following selection is from the pen of Dr. Newman, who in his travels in the Holy Land, gives many entertaining and beautiful sketches of what he saw and learned in his journey from Dan to Beersheba:]

Following in the footsteps of the Master, on Good Friday eve I descended the acclivities of Moriah, crossed the same stoue bridge over which he had passed, and, entering the Garden of Gethsemane, I sat down beneath the aged olive-trees, and read the touching story of his passion. Returning to the city, in an "upper room," in company with a few friends, I partook of the Lord's Supper. That night I could not sleep. Walking out upon the house-top, I looked down upon Gethsemane. Unbroken silence reigned. The city slumbered. The lights around the balcony of the minaret burned dimly. The night wind blew softly from over the deep sea. The paschal moon was descending in the west. A silvery haze, like a gauze of purity, overspread the serene heavens. It was four o'clock in the morning. From an adjacent court-yard a cock announced the dawn of day. The distant east began to glow with the morning's earliest light. It was Good Friday in Jerusalem—the hour and the event of all time. Well may Christian affection ask, "Where is Calvary?" Who would not approach such a place in silent prayer? Wisely its identity is unknown to earth. Though its location is the first object of research by the Christian traveller when he enters the Holy City, yet it is the last to be determined with satisfaction. Tradition designates a rock, inclosed within the Church of the Holy Sepulchre, as the Mount of Crucifixion; but the site involves a controversy so complicated, that the mind prefers the recollection of the event to the examination of the argument. * * *

Toward the northeast corner of the city wall the sides of Bezetha are steep, rocky and broken. There desolation is complete, and the seclusion profound. The Kidron Valley winds around those rugged declivities, and the opposite sides of Olivet are barren and cheerless. Midway the hill there is a projecting rock, not unlike in form a human skull; on the north of it, a small ravine descends into the vale below, and just beneath it, on the east, the highway passes to the Heights of Beujamin. The sides are steep and covered with black moss. The term Calvary neither implies, nor is it used to designate a mount, but, coming from the Latin calvaria or calva, means a skull. If Golgotha is descriptive of a place where skulls lay uninterred, then this location agrees well with the sense of the word, as the dead that were here interred were so slightly covered with earth that the bones of such now lay scattered upon the ground; or if, as is more probable, it is the designation of a place where violent deaths occurred—the place for the capital punishment of criminals, whose bones, after the flesh had been devoured by wild beasts, lay bleaching in the sun, then this, of all other portions of the environs of the city, is singularly adapted for such a melancholy purpose. * * *

The Via Dolorosa is a lane-like street, narrow and crooked, leading from St. Stephen's Gate to the Church of the Holy Sepulchre, and its dolorous name is no less significant of the tragical events which, according to tradition, occurred along its course, than of its forbidding and gloomy aspect. Like the "street which is called straight" in Damascus, and the Via Sacra in ancient Rome, the Via Dolorosa has a world-wide renown. Its windings, its rough pavement, its prison-like walls—penetrated with low doorways and grated windows—its rude arcade, excluding the sunlight and casting a deeper gloom within, sadden the mind, and are in keeping with the legends that have given to it universal notoriety. Along this dreary walk, amid its shadows and solemn memories, a wounded spirit finds companionship. As the industrious shrine-makers of this and of other ages, the monks have consecrated eight stations in this narrow street, commemorative of as many events in our Lord's journey from the dungeons of Antonia to the site of Calvary. In the northern wall of the Temple area are the two arches, now walled up, where stood Pilate's staircase, down which our Lord descended after his sentence was pronounced, and directly opposite is the Church of Flagellation, marking the place where he was scourged. Not many paces to the west is the Ecce Homo arch, where Pilate exclaimed to the infuriated mob, "Behold the man!" At the bottom of a gentle descent the lane turns to the left, and then to the right. Beyond this angle is shown a deep impression in the solid stone wall, made by the shoulder of Jesus when he leaned against it at the time he fainted. Near it is the house of St. Veronica, the illustrious woman who presented the Savior with a handkerchief to wipe his bleeding brow. From her residence to the terminus of the street the gloom and silence are painful; and at well-apportioned intervals are indicated, by broken columns, the places where Simon was compelled to bear the Redeemer's cross, where Jesus addressed the weeping daughters of Jerusalem, and where his tragical death occurred.

Throughout Good Friday groups of pious pilgrims were threading the Via Dolorosa and offering their prayers at its legendary shrines. That night the Latin monks dramatized the crucifixion of Christ in the Church of the Holy Sepulchre. At an early hour the venerable Church of St. Helena was thronged with natives and strangers, consisting of Greeks, Latins, Copts, Armenians, Turks and Franks. To prevent a disturbance, the military governor of the city had ordered a detachment of Turkish soldiers to be present. Among the dignitaries in attendance to witness the fictitious tragedy were foreign consuls attended by liveried cawasses, a hundred French officers, with their orderlies, who had that day arrived from Beirut, and prominent among the distinguished persons was Lessep, the famous canal-digger, who had ascended from Egypt in an improvised chariot drawn by a pair of the noblest camels, and was the first who had crossed that ancient road since the day of Roman chariots.

It was past eight o'clock when the solemn drama was opened with the recitation of prayers in the sacristy of the Latin chapel. The light of a hundred gold and silver lamps, fed by olive-oil, scarcely dispelled the darkness of the hour. At 9 P. M. the pageant was fully commenced, and the long procession began its march, each person bearing a wax taper that shone dimly on the air of night. First came Augustine friars, attired in brown cowls and cassocks; then followed a stalwart monk, bearing an immense cross of light-colored wood, curiously figured. On the cross was nailed the carved figure of a man, crowned with thorns, from whose side the life-blood was flowing, and around whose loins was drawn a white linen cloth. Behind the crucifix came two choirs of monks and catechumens robed in white, chanting a funeral dirge, with responsive chorus; following the singers was Rome's eminent prelate, the patriarchal Bishop of Jerusalem, crowned with a gold mitre, wearing a black velvet cloak richly trimmed with gold lace, and bearing in his right hand a gold crucifix adorned with jewels; following in his train were priests of lesser rank in dark robes, and barefooted friars with shaven heads, to imitate the crown of thorns, and nuns in blue and black garments and white linen bonnets; and next came the French consul, the military officers, the common soldiers, poor pilgrims, and strangers from all nations, whose devotion or curiosity prompted them to join the imposing procession.

Within the church are lateral chapels, regarded as shrines by the pious, such as the prison of Christ, the chapel where he was bound, where he was mocked, and where his vestments were divided by the Roman soldiers. At the chapels the procession halted to listen to sermons preached in the Italian, French, German, Arabic and English languages. It was near midnight when the procession reached the foot of Calvary. Slowly ascending the rude steps cut in the solid rock, the heavy cross was set in its original resting-place on the summit. In imitation of the supernatural darkness, every light was extinguished. At that moment a tumult occurred. The rough voice of derision rose above the universal clamor, and echoed through the aisles and arches of that ancient building, as the Turkish soldiers charged upon the people. Enraged at the insult offered to his religion, the French consul drew his sword, threatening death to Turk or Christian who should crowd upon him. In a moment quiet was restored and the scene went on. Accident gave the charm of reality to the occasion. There stood the captain of the guard, with the smile of scorn upon his attractive though stern features; around him were his troops, and near them were fanatical Moslems reviling the spectacle; standing afar off were Christian women, robed in white sheets, concealing their person except their soft dark eyes, which peered out above their veils; and surging to and fro, like mighty waves, was a motley throng eager to behold the drama. Amid the solemnities human nature was revealed. * * *

The three sermons at the several crosses ended, the lights burn dimly again. And now began the descent from the cross, after the style of Rubens's great picture. Three venerable monks, impersonating Joseph of Arimathea, Nicodemus, and St. John the Evangelist, approached the cross to take the body down. One, climbing up behind the cross, and throwing a sheet around the body and under the arms of the image, held it fast, while another tenderly drew out the nails, kissing each one in turn as he laid them upon a silver plate; then receiving the body into his arms, with the head resting on his shoulder, wrapped it in fine linen, placed it upon a bier, and to the chant of another dirge the procession descended to the pavement of the church, where the image was placed upon the stone of unction for anointing, and hence borne to the tomb of Joseph, to await the joyous notes of Easter Sunday.

M. Edouard de Beaumont, an artist, who is also a distinguished archaeologist, has discovered among some hitherto undeciphered papers at the Ecole des Chartes a document giving the details of the falling in of a mine, by which a number of Burgundian soldiers, fully equipped in their accoutrements were buried alive. This circumstance is recorded to have taken place at the beginning of the fifteenth century in the neighborhood of Laon. M. de Beaumont has already commenced the necessary diggings, and archaeologists are deeply interested in his success.

ONE WORD WITH THEE.

ONE word with thee—one sweet, yet mournful meeting,
If but to catch again thy low, soft tone,
And clasp thy hand, and feel its warm pulse beating
With love's delicious throb against my own!
If but to catch thine eye, and hear thee say
I will remember thee when far away.

One word with thee—though not of hope or gladness;
On which to muse when we are far apart;
A whisper breathed in silence and in sadness,
To leave a hush forever in my heart.
One word to treasure in my bosom's core;
Whether we meet again, or meet no more.

One word with thee—one brief, yet blissful meeting—
To catch thy voice—where last we met alone;
Whose faintest sigh can set this heart to beating
With thoughts and feelings that it dare not own;
One word of bliss: O God! and can it be
That this may be our last? One word with thee!

TIDINGS OF SUSAN.

"I WISH to Heaven she had stopped with you," exclaimed Francis Tredethlyn. "She had few friends, poor girl, and had no need to leave any one who felt kindly towards her."

"But she did leave us," replied Miss Banks; "she paid mother every farthing she owed her, and packed up her few little things. She would make me take some of her pretty ribbons and collars, that had been bought in Paris, and never worn out, for she didn't care to dress herself smart when Mr. Leslie was not at home; and then she sent for a cab and went away. I heard her tell the driver Shoreditch railway station, for I ran out to the cab and kissed her the last thing and begged her to come and see us whenever she came back to London; and she promised that if she lived, and things went well with her, she would. But from that day to this we've never set eyes upon her."

And this was the end of what Miss Banks had to tell. Francis Tredethlyn's thoughts wandered back to Mrs. Burfield; it was to her that Susan Tredethlyn had gone in the March of 1851. So far the girl's history is complete; but the grand question still remained, Where was she now to be found? A deserted wife, a friendless, and perhaps penniless mother; what had become of this lonely, inexperienced girl between the March of 1851 and this present autumn of 1853.

"But surely you can give me some clue by which I may trace my cousin?" said Francis, after a pause; "you can give me the address of some friend, some intimate acquaintance of Mr. Leslie's; he must have had visitors while he lived here."

Jemima shook her head decisively.

"Not one," she answered: "except for bringing his brother home to dinner once or twice, when he was first married, no mortal belonging to Mr. Leslie ever darkened mother's doors. Mother and me used to think it odd, and of course there always are advantages in lodgers keeping much company, which makes up for extra trouble; and the most audacious lockers up that ever were can't go and lock up under visitors' very noses. But we supposed, as Mr. Leslie's marriage was a secret one, he didn't care to bring his friends home."

"But his brother came?"

"Yes, only when they were first married; he never came after."

"Did you hear the brother's address?"

"Well, I have heard that it was in some of those law places, the Temple, or Gray's Inn; but I never heard any nearer than that."

Mr. Tredethlyn gave a despairing sigh; he thought of Mrs. Burfield's description of his cousin, pale and wan, waving her little hand out of the carriage window as she left Colton slough, friendless and poor. Was it not more than likely that she had only gone away to die, and that his search for her would end at last in the discovery of a grave?

But might not the man, the husband who had deserted his innocent and confiding wife, might not he be found and made to pay a heavy penalty for his sins? Vengeance seems but a poor thing at the best, but it is at least something; and Francis Tredethlyn felt a fierce desire for revenge against the cold-blooded destroyer of his cousin Susan's happiness.

He asked Miss Banks many more questions, but she could tell him no more than she had already told him. She had never heard anything of Mr. Leslie's family or antecedents, directly or indirectly. She knew he went to college, but she never remembered hearing what college. She had fancied sometimes that Mr. Leslie's name was an assumed one: indeed, she was sure it was; for when his brother had come to dine at Woolcote Villas the first time, he had inquired for Mr. Robert by some other name. Unfortunately, that other name had entirely escaped Miss Jemima's recollection.

"He caught himself up short," she said, "as if he was vexed with himself for having let slip that other name, and I never heard it again the whole time Mr. and Mrs. Leslie were with us. I don't think Susan knew much more about her husband's affairs than I did, for he always treated her like a child; and even when he was kindest to her, he seemed to have a high and mighty way with her, that would have kept any timid person from asking questions."

Francis thanked Miss Banks very heartily for the trouble she had taken to enlighten him to the extent of her power, and then bade her good afternoon.

"If you should meet with any one wanting apartments and board, either partial or entire, you'll perhaps be kind enough to bear mother in mind," the young lady said, as she escorted him to the door. He murmured some polite assurance that he would neglect no opportunity of promoting Mrs. Banks's interest, and returned to the Hansom which had been waiting for him during his prolonged interview with the good-natured Jemima.

From Woolcote Villas he drove to the office of the Marylebone registrar, and from that official he obtained an assurance that the marriage between Robert Leslie and Susan Turner, on the twenty-fifth of February, 1849, was, so far as his part of the business went, as legally binding as if the ceremony had been performed by the Archbishop of Canterbury within the solemn precincts of Westminster Abbey.

"If they chose to be married in false names, that was their business," said the registrar, "and they might find themselves bothered about it by-and-by. But, except where there's property, it isn't often that a person's called upon to prove his marriage. I suppose, by your making the inquiry, there is property in this case?"

Francis Tredethlyn shook his head.

"I know no more about that than you do," he said.

"Well, shan't forget that business in a hurry," said the registrar, who was inclined to be communicative. "In the first place, the man was one of your regular tip-top swells, and that's a kind of party we don't often see here; and in the next place, he gave me a twenty-pound note, which was the first windfall of that kind that ever dropped into my pocket, and is more than likely to be the last."

"Can you tell me what the man was like?"

"Tall and fair, with blue eyes and light hair; your regular swell: not the heavy military swell—more of a delicate, womanish way with him; but such as you may see by the dozen any afternoon in St. James's street or Pall Mall."

This description was no clearer than that given by Jemima Banks. Francis could scarcely walk through a London street without meeting with some man who might be described in the same words. He left the registrar's office, and went back to his hotel; and, absorbed in the arduous duties of his toilet, thought alternately of lost Susan Tredethlyn, alias Susan Leslie, and of beautiful Maude Hillary, who was so soon to be his wife.

CHAPTER XXIV.

FRANCIS TREDETHLYN'S DISINTERESTED ADVISER.

She was so soon to be his wife! Yes, October was near at hand. Already the woods and hills beyond the "Star and Garter" were bright with autumnal tints of vivid orange and glowing crimson. The milliners and dressmakers, the outfitters and bootmakers, were perpetually appearing in the hall and on the staircases at the Cedars. Wicker baskets lined with oilskin seemed continually passing in and out of Mr. Hillary's abode, and Maude could rarely enjoy a quiet half-hour undisturbed by a mysterious summons, entreating her to inspect or to try on some garment newly brought home by a "young person" from town. Harcourt Lowther made himself quite at home both at the Cedars and at Francis Tredethlyn's chambers during this period of preparation. Francis took very kindly to his old master in his new capacity of friend and mentor. The habits of the past made a link between them. The old, half-friendly, half-supercilious familiarity which had characterized Harcourt Lowther's treatment of his servant melted now into a playful and almost caressing friendliness. Mr. Lowther was a thoroughly selfish man, and he found himself called upon in this instance to sacrifice his pride in the cause of his interest. He affected a hearty interest in Francis Tredethlyn's affairs, and contrived, somehow, by a series of manoeuvres, so subtle as to be imperceptible, to instal himself in the post of chief adviser to the inexperienced young Cornishman. Mr. Lowther was an idle man, a very clever man, too versatile for greatness, or even for any celebrity beyond that species of drawing-room reputation which women are able to bestow on the men who are not too noble to waste a lifetime in small accomplishments and shallow courtesies. He was very clever, very idle, very much inclined to quarrel with the decrees of Providence; and in Francis Tredethlyn he saw the possessor of the two things he himself most ardently desired—a great fortune, and Maude Hillary for a wife. But he was true to his resolution to take matters quietly; and he assisted in the preparations for the wedding with as much outward show of pleasure as if he had been a match-making mother, rejoicing in the happy disposal of a whole brood of daughters. The big mansion in the new district of palatial streets and squares lying between Kensington and Brompton was fitted and furnished under Lowther's superintendence. He had meetings with architects, gilders, decorators and upholsterers; and, with only an occasional reference to Francis, gave his orders as freely as if the house had been his own. Sometimes, walking up and down the whole length of the three drawing-rooms, a strange smile flickered over his face—a contemplative smile, which faded away in the next moment, giving place to that perfection of fashionable indifference to all things in heaven and earth which was his ordinary expression.

The appointed day came at last, and poor Francis drove down to Twickenham, looking as pale as his light waistcoat, but supported by his friend Harcourt Lowther as best man. Once, and once only, Maude Hillary looked at her discarded lover while she remained Maude Hillary; but there was a world of mingled scorn and reproach in that one look. Ah! how different his love must have been from hers, she thought. Had he forsaken her for a wealthier bride, she would have gone far away from the sound of his wedding bells, and the sight of his wedding finery. In that one look she had seen that he was almost as pale as the bridegroom, but she could not forgive him for being there.

There was all the usual business. Autumnal flowers scattered under the feet of the bride and bridegroom; charity children in clean pinafores cheering in shrill treble voices as the bridal carriage drove away; and then a breakfast, and the popping of champagne corks, and the creaming of the delicately perfumed Moselle, and a little speech-making of the mildest character; and then a departure amidst all the confusion of a crowded hall and portico—young lady intimates pressing forward to caress the bride; loud-voiced young men congratulating the bridegroom; servants with white favors standing on tiptoe to get a peep at the show; and then the postillions crack their whips, and the carriage rolls away through the chill autumn evening, and Maude sees Twickenham town spin by her in a dim glimmer of comfortable fire-light, twinkling redly in cottage windows.

The wedding tour had been amongst the many things which Harcourt Lowther had kindly undertaken to plan for his friend, and after a great deal of deliberation, that gentleman had pitched upon one of the dullest and quietest watering-places in Devonshire, as the one spot upon all this earth best suited for Mr. Tredethlyn and his bride.

"You don't want the stereotyped Continental tour; the Rhine steamers are crowded with cockneys, who find it easier to spout Childe Harold than to regulate the administration of their h's. What do you know about the castled crag of Drachenfels, dear boy, and what do you care for all the hackneyed sentimentality about beery old knights and battered old castles? You don't speak any language but your honest native tongue, and you would be bothered out of your life before your travels were over—unless you took a courier—and then imagine seeing nature through the eyes of a courier! No, my dear Tredethlyn; the sort of thing for you is some quiet little watering-place—an humble cot, in a tranquil spot, with a distant view of the changing sea; and all that sort of thing; in other words, a tranquil little retreat where you and Mrs. Tredethlyn may have time to get acquainted with one another."

Francis was only too glad to take such pleasant advice. To be alone with Maude, alone beside the still gray sea in the quiet autumn evenings, seemed to him the highest bliss that earth could hold for any human being; and poor Francis blessed his generous friend for the sound judgment which was to secure him such happiness.

"I dare say I should have gone scampering all over the Continent, but for you, Lowther," he said, innocently. "Those other fellows at the Cedars advised a tour through half Europe: 'See plenty of life,' they said; 'freshen yourself up with change of scene, and pick up all the jargon you can out of Murray, so as to be able to hold your own in society. Everybody travels nowadays, and it doesn't do for a fellow with lots of tin to be behind the rest of the world.' But I'll take your advice, Lowther. I wanted Maude to choose the place for our bridal trip, but she wouldn't; so we'll go to the Devonshire village."

It is not to be supposed, of course, that Mr. Lowther had any other than the most friendly intention when he selected Combe Western as the scene of Francis Tredethlyn's honeymoon: but, on the other hand, it must be confessed that had Harcourt wished to inspire Maude with a weariness of her husband's society, he could have scarcely selected any place better calculated to assist him in the carrying out of his design. At Combe Western, the misty autumn days were unbroken by any change, save the slow changes of the hours, and the gradual darkening of the sky. There were pleasant drives and romantic scenery to be found in the neighborhood of Combe Western; but Devonshire is a rainy county, and as it rained with little intermission during the whole of that honeymoon period, Francis Tredethlyn's bride was compelled to find her chief amusement in the prim lodgug-house drawing room and the society of her husband.

And this society was not congenial to her. He was handsome and pleasant to look at; manly, good-tempered, generous. No mean or unworthy sentiment ever dropped from his lips. She respected him, and was grateful to him; nay, even beyond this, there was a certain latent affection for him lurking in some corner of her heart, but she was very tired of him nevertheless. To be truly attached to a person, and desperately weary of them, is not altogether an impossibility. Are we not sometimes weary of ourselves, whom we yet love so dearly? When you get tired of a book you have nothing to do but close the volume and restore it to its shelf. But you cannot shut up your friend when he becomes tedious; you must needs go on, wading through page after page of his conversation till you yawn in his face, and arouse him to the unpleasant conviction that he is a nuisance.

Maude was very gratefully and affectionately disposed towards her father's benefactor; but she grew terribly tired of his sole companionship during that rainy six weeks in the quiet Devon watering-place. If the bride and bridegroom had gone on that stereotyped foreign tour so strongly protested against by Harcourt Lowther, Maude's sunny nature would speedily have asserted itself. She would have found in the rapid changes of scene, in all the pleasant excitement of quick travelling, plenty of subject matter for conversation with her new companion; there would have been always some common ground on which they could have met, some little incidents of a traveller's day, which would have aroused a sympathy between them. But thrown on their own resources at Combe Western, a Horace Walpole and a Madame du Deffand might have exhausted their conversational powers, and yawned in each other's faces. Maude found herself wishing for the end of her honeymoon before the first week thereof had drawn to its close; and Francis, always timidly watchful of his wife's beautiful face, felt a chill anguish at his heart as he perceived her weariness of spirit.

Thus it was that, when they returned to London, the husband and wife were little nearer to each other than on their wedding day. No pleasant familiarity with each other's thoughts and feelings had arisen during that dull residence in a dull watering place. That subtle process of assimilation by which—except in some dismal examples—husband and wife grow like each other in mind and feeling had not yet begun. They were strangers still; in spite of Maude's esteem for her husband's character, in spite of Francis Tredethlyn's blind idolatry of his wife's perfections; and Harcourt Lowther, who was one of the guests at their first dinner-party, was not slow to recognize the state of the case.

"You'll get on admirably together by-and-by, dear boy," he said to Francis, as they smoked their cigars together, in a luxurious little study behind the big library, some days after the great dinner. "You'll get on superbly with your lovely wife, if you only play your cards cleverly. There must be no Darby and Joan business, you know—no sentimentalism. Lionel Hillary's daughter is just the woman to be disgusted by that sort of thing. It was all very well, of course, to do the romantic during the honeymoon; but that's all over now. Your wife will go her way, and you'll go yours. Her friends will absorb you. You'll have your club, your horses, your men's parties, and perhaps, by-and-by, the House—for you ought decidedly to get into Parliament—and it will be utterly impossible for you to spend all your mornings hanging about your wife's rooms, or nursing her Skye terriers, as you seem to have done hitherto."

"But I like so much to be with her," Francis remonstrated, piteously. "It's very friendly of you to give me these hints, and I daresay you're right, to some degree. I know Maude used to seem very tired at Combe Western, and we both got into the habit of looking at our watches in a dispiriting kind of way every quarter of an hour; but since we've come to London she has quite recovered her spirits, and we are so happy together; you should have heard her laugh the other morning, when I taught one of the Skyes to shoulder arms with a lead pencil."

Mr. Tredethlyn laughed aloud himself at the recollection of this feat. Harcourt Lowther shrugged his shoulders, and a frown, or the passing shadow of a frown, darkened his handsome face.

There are some natures in which there is a certain element of childishness, and between such natures no desperate antagonism is ever likely to arise.

"We were dull at Combe Western," said Mr. Tredethlyn, presently; "but since we've been in London we've got on capitally. I've been everywhere with Maude—shopping even; and I've written out the lists for her parties, and been on a round of calls; and, in short, I've been the happiest fellow in all creation."

"No doubt, my dear boy; that sort of thing's delightful for a fortnight; but look out for the day when the twin demons of satiety and disgust will arise to wither all these Arcadian delights."

Francis pondered gravely. He had been happy since his return to London, for he had seen Maude bright and lively, pleased with the novelty of her position, happy in her father's affectionate welcome, serene in the consciousness of pure intentions, and grateful for the devotion, of which some new evidence met her at every turn. Poor Francis had been entirely happy; but it needed only a whisper from an elegant Mephistopheles in modern costume to render this simple Cornishman doubtful even of his own happiness. It might be only a sham and delusion after all, and Maude's sunniest smile might be the smile of a victim resigned to the sacrifice.

"If you think that Maude is likely to grow tired—," Francis began, in a very melancholy tone; but Mr. Lowther interrupted him.

"If I think! my dear boy. How can I do otherwise than think what is obvious to the dullest apprehension. Take life as other people take it, my dear, simple-minded Tredethlyn, and you'll find it go smoothly enough with you. Try to live on a plan of your own, and—the rest is chaos. No woman will long tolerate a man tied to her apron-string. She may be flattered by his devotion in the beginning, but she ends by despising his folly."

So it was that Francis Tredethlyn began life under the advice of his friend, Harcourt Lowther. After that evening in the studio the young husband no longer intruded himself upon his wife's leisure, or attempted to identify himself with her pursuits. He found plenty to occupy his own time, for Harcourt Lowther always had some new scheme for his friend's employment or amusement. A race, that no man living in the world could exist without seeing; a horse to be sold at Tattersall's; a celebrated collection of pictures at Christie and Manson's; a bachelor's dinner at a club; a review at Wimbledon; somehow or other there was always something to be seen, or something to be done, of a nature in which Mrs. Tredethlyn could neither have any part nor feel any interest; and when Francis and his friend dined alone with her, as they did very often, it happened somehow that the conversation was always of a horsey and masculine character, painfully wearisome to the ordinary female mind. If Mr. Lowther had been intent on widening the natural gulf which circumstance had set between these two people, he could scarcely have gone to work more skillfully than he did; though it is of course to be presumed that he was only an unconscious instrument, an involuntary agent of mischief and ruin.

MECHLIN IN THE NETHERLANDS.

[FROM Alfred Trample's forthcoming volume, "The War Correspondent in Europe," the annexed description of the Mechlin Cathedral tower and the beautiful chimies of its famous carillon, is selected. The strolling hero, one Applegate Shrink, happens in his wanderings to visit the old city, and thus vividly describes the cathedral:]

APPLEGATE obtained rooms for his patrons in a hotel upon the Grand Place, but took more modest quarters for himself in a boatman's inn on the river-side. The rest of the company, being wearied with travelling, kept in their quarters, and he sallied out to see the churches and the town. There are many fine edifices in the Netherlands, but it was a whim of the young courier that this cathedral of Mechlin exceeded them all in grandeur. Its massive gray tower went up so dizzily that the head reeled to follow with the eyes its flights of buttresses. It was like a champion of man, with its granite feet wide planted, looking defiance to God. It seemed to grow higher as one measured it, lifting the beholder, as by some spell of loftiness, till with his thoughts his body seemed ascending. As we grapple some precipice firmly, and yet fear to peer down the abyss lest we might fall, so Applegate felt his feet falter as he gazed up, and up, and up, and up again, as by some infinity of spaces too vast to be inclosed in a single glance, and he could have wished to cling to the solid earth with both his hands, lest it should sink beneath him, and he go floating like the stones on the fair pinnacles to some niche above the swallows' nests. There were other objects to attract: the priests who entered and departed below; the poor old women and the school-children climbing the steps of the transepts, the many fantastic carvings above the windows and portals, yet none of these could divert him from the grand tower. The eagles should have been its architects, to bear its separate stones so far into the sky.

While the great mariner was on the ocean, searching for a world, the Flemish masons were wearily heaping up this landmark. They did not hope to see it finished; for those were the days when art was its own recompense, and generation after generation took up work and helped it forward—as in our own time, a few men put a stone to the world's liberties, though they may not see the perfect edifice. Applegate attempted to restore to the cathedral its dangerous scaffolds and the masons who trod their gossamer floors. The sounds of trowel and adze rang out again, mingled with turbulent choruses. He heard the names of Charles the Bold and his fair daughter of Burgundy blended with the deeds of the dauntless guildsmen who scattered the chivalry of France and England, and dictated terms to kings. Suddenly, a multitude of birds darted through the open windows far up among the highest pinnacles, and a peal of beautiful music floated out on the evening-air. It was the cathedral-carillon. It fell far and wide over the silent city, like wings of sound folded for the night upon a brood of tiny houses. It was at first a local peal like the lark's as she sings upon her perch; but by-and-by, the air, which had only quivered like the feet of listeners who are eager to dance, took up the music, and seemed itself to sing.

The song went out in wavy undulations, as if the thousand tune-birds were flying everywhere. Now soft, now keen, now silvery, now profound; the hundred bells seized the measure in their turn, and at last the dim old city grew intoxicated with music. The quaint Flemish gables seemed to rock, like the trees to the lute of Orpheus; the belfry of the mossy halles was quite beside itself with merriment; the wooden shoes upon the uneven stones kept time to the notes of the musician, and in the end, the whole round landscape, like a world, rose and fell to the irresistible cadences. What emotions were not expressed in this grand opera—love, mercy, despotism, energy, power. You can hear the mother's lullaby mingled with battle-bugles; a sweetheart's ballad is drowned by a deep requiem; the farmer's boy, tilling a field, glides into the loud chorus of the congregation praising God, and when the carillon ceases, the earth still thrills as if the very winds had come from their four quarters to murmur at their disappointment because too late.

Applegate obtained the key to the tower-door from a beer-shop near by, and a chatting old woman followed him up the dim stone stairs; he could not have found his way unguided; the flights were many, and disconnected; now and then the route leading around the outside of the tower, gave him glimpses of the deep city, and at last he gained the belfry where the carillon hung suspended. There were not less than a hundred bells, of all sizes, from the most minute clochette to the huge beffroi or tocsin, arranged in parallel lines, and connected by wires with the keys of some invisible instrument. The old woman pointed out the closet where the musician was hidden; and, to be rid of her garrulity, the lad gave her a few sous, and obtained permission to descend when he pleased. New flights of steps carried him to the last stage of the tower, whence, climbing a high ladder, he gained the edge of the battlement, 348 feet from the ground. Mechlin lay beneath him, divided by the river Dyle, which meandered like a ribbon through the meadows around the tower, and at the horizon rose the faint spires of four great cities, Louvain, Brussels, Ghent, Antwerp.

At this spot one should read the history of the Netherlands, thought Applegate, with the whole country beneath one for a chart, for, upon this little circle of space all civilization was once concentrated—art, architecture, learning, manufactures, commerce—it was their cradle as it became their grave! Out of this panorama filed those great Crusaders who set up the cross in Jerusalem.

A new religion started behind them; its creed was equality and liberty; weavers and brewers were its apostles; it has proselytized half the world. Then came trade, without which there can be neither learning nor art, to turn into the Low Countries rivers of wealth. Soon rose new reformers, who tempered faith with freedom. They laid down their lives not in vain, if, leaving the old religion, they left more rights to man.

But decadence ensued; labor hoisted its golden fleece and sailed away to England; Applegate saw the grass growing in Mechlin streets; a bugle rang out as he gazed, and a squadron of clumsy Belgian cavalry came filing into the town; these were the pitiful descendants of the dauntless burghers and artisans who once defied the Emperor of Europe! The old town gave a deserted echo to their tramp; a few Flemish boors came out of the rare old gables to look on, and when the horses' hoofs sounded no longer, silence and gloom, like a habitual garment, fell upon the old ecclesiastical city.

Here the bells below began to play, and the lad, anxious to see them in operation, descended to the tower. The huge stone walls threw back the sound, till every stone in the broad structure tingled, and Applegate imagined himself upon the inside of one great bell. Responsive to the fingers of the invisible musician, each tongue was vocal in its turn. And so had this same carillon sung to Mechlin for four centuries of day and night, in peace and war, deserted or besieged, in her affluence and in her prostration. Whatever mutations marked the world around it, the high tower in the clouds made music for ever.

AN AUTHOR'S PROFITS.—Dumas the elder has worked twenty years for ten hours a day; he has written 400 volumes of novels and thirty-five plays. Together they have been sold for 18,213,600 francs, that is to say, about £728,544. For twenty years M. Dumas employed, or rather caused to be employed, no less than 692 persons. During his visit to this country, he is to be the guest of the Hon. George Bancroft of New York.

THE USES OF VICTORY.

WITH the capture of Lee's army that phase of our national struggle which may be aptly termed the warrior's era has passed. Those positive forces which a four years war have slowly gathered will henceforth meet with little to expend their strength upon, and the era of the statesmen and thinker, of argument and conciliation, is close at hand. But an unforeseen difficulty may arise. It must not be forgotten that we were hurried into this war by feebly-protracted statesmanship, and it is not improbable that, on the other hand, peace may be delayed by retention of the martial spirit and the acquired velocity of a tremendous material force that four years ago was set in motion.

The best argument in favor of a conciliatory spirit toward the rebels lies in the fact that we have triumphed over the rebellion. Whatever may be the fate of Jefferson Davis, the Confederacy of which he was the Chief Magistrate is at an end; whatever may be done with Lee, the army which he so ably commanded is annihilated. Whatever may be the final disposition of the tools of these two chief conspirators, the absurd theories which they labored to uphold, the fallacies for which they bled with a courage and endurance worthy of a good cause and purer motive, are overthrown. If we may take the words of Vice President Stephens, that "slavery was the keystone of the Confederacy," with the removal of that hideous blot upon humanity and progress, the arch has fallen, and we can feel little else than pity for the few short-sighted laborers who have barely escaped destruction in its ruin. That principle of human justice which demands an example for the purpose of deterring the future commission of a similar crime, does not obtain here. With the destruction of slavery and State rights, the cumulative causes of the rebellion can never occur again. Civilization and progress are continually leading us out of the pitfalls in which we have stumbled. If it has been truly said that the precedents of other nations offer no guide to our own policy, the law that beheads and quarters the traitor was founded on absolutism and terror, and belongs to a principle of government which is often as illogically shown in the decapitation of royal heads and the overthrow of institutions that are supposed to be of divine origin. Within the last few centuries, the theories of government have undergone a radical change. Its strength is no longer measured by its power over the subject, but rather by its own self-control. The strongest government is no longer that which is the most rigid, but that which can afford to be the most merciful.

As the policies of statesmen are more or less controlled or impeded by the spirit of the people, and as this in its turn is influenced by the press, it becomes those conservators of public sentiment to modify that rancor into which the advocacy of extreme exparte views, proper enough in time of war, but mischievous in peace, have often unwittingly betrayed them. Some of these journals will languish for their customary pabulum. Others will find it hard to give up certain formulas which have in some way taken the place of ideas, and a few will have to abandon invective—always a cheap and easy form of composition. But having great faith in the recuperative powers of the American mind, and the curative qualities of our national atmosphere we can believe that this class will prove only an exception and that the homely sound sense of the nation, represented as it is by the Chief Magistrate, will prevail. In this Mr. Lincoln will have an able supporter in Mr. Seward, whom we trust, spite of his serious accident, may long be spared to the nation. The fact that no war or foreign embroilment has sprung out of our foreign complications during the last few years is an evidence of his ability to grapple with the even more delicate questions of the hour.

THE ACCIDENT TO SECRETARY SEWARD.—The latest news of the condition of Secretary Seward is to the effect that his injuries by the fall from his carriage are assuming a dangerous character. Erysipelas is threatened. Medical men fear that he cannot repair the waste of vitality, in consequence of his inability to partake of solid food, and that the coming warm weather will be fatal to him. Even in the midst of popular rejoicing over the glorious events which promise peace and Union, intelligence of this nature will cast a gloom over the land.

PSYCHOLOGY AND MAGNETISM.—The entertaining lectures of Dr. Benton have been given nightly at Platt's Hall during the week, and have been well attended. These lectures are accompanied with some surprising illustrations of magnetic power, and are awakening an increasing interest in the community. Dr. Benton lectures this evening, after which he will be forced to suspend his series, until the latter part of next week, owing to the hall being held under prior engagements.

GRASS VALLEY NATIONAL.—A change has recently taken place in the editorial department of this paper; W. S. Byrne withdraws and J. R. Ridge becomes sole editor. The National has always been a welcome exchange, and we doubt not—now that the war-cloud has well-nigh passed, and the discussion of national policy may give place in some degree to more pleasant and genial topics—Mr. Ridge will make it one of the best journals in the State.

WE this week publish Part First of a story by an English writer: "My First Brief." The conclusion will be given in our next number. Americans are not over-sensitive, nowadays, in regard to the criticisms of their cousins across the water—in fact, rather like to see how they appear through English glasses—and a good story should not be lost because it gives an occasional rap at our peculiarities, real or imagined.

A grand vocal and instrumental concert in aid of the Society of St. Vincent de Paul will be given at Union Hall, Howard street, Monday evening, 17th inst. The best musical talent of the State has been engaged, and as the work of the society is the relief of the destitute without regard to race or sect, there should be a crowded house. Remember—"He who giveth to the poor, lendeth to the Lord."

Judge Hoffman on Wednesday passed sentence on the officers of the Great Republic, as follows: Captain J. W. Paul, for assault on Daniel Gilliopson, six months in the county jail. First Mate Lott B. Walls, for assault on Manuel Rodriguez, John C. McLaren, James Dunn, Henry Bates, and Daniel Gilliopson, sixteen months in the county jail. Second Mate William Coes, for assault on George M. Daggett with a dangerous weapon, eighteen months, with hard labor, in the State Prison. It is only just to say that throughout the trial of these offenders against humanity and law, the utmost energy has been displayed by Assistant District Attorney Sullivan, and no point omitted which had a proper bearing in procuring their conviction.

In re-publishing a poem from the pen of Mrs. Emilie Lawson, on our second page, a line was omitted from the concluding stanza; the mistake was overlooked in the hurry of sending the "first side" of the paper to press. The verse should read as follows:

Lost? lost?
No soul is lost!
Bright gems on the breast of Beauty shine
From the rayless caverns of the mine.
So, from the depths of the soul's despair
A flower may grow for a saint to wear;
And Love's young heart by the tempest cross
May have Indian Summer after frost,
If we learn the Right, by the Wrong's sad cost—
We are saved—not lost.

OPERA SEASON.—Opera cloaks are beginning to be looked up by their fair owners, and premonitory scrapings of fiddles are heard on rehearsal mornings at the Metropolitan. Astrologically the indications of the musical "stars" portend a gay season and a plethoric treasury. The Bianchis open at the Metropolitan on Monday night with Lucia. Maguire's grand troupe, already on their way here, will probably open their season at the Academy of Music about the first of May. The company consists of the far-famed Adelaide Phillips, prima donna contralto; Signora Sconcia, prima donna soprano; Sbriglia, tenor; Mafio, basso, and Orlandino, baritone. The troupe will bring with them the costumes and music of La Prophete, Faust, Don Sebastian, Lu Juive, Un Ballo in Maschera and other new operas. Mr. Rieff, the former musical director of the Lyster troupe, completed the engagement with those artistes and will occupy his former position in the present troupe.

The family of Old John Brown are living in Red Bluff, and are in a needy condition. In Sacramento and Marysville subscriptions are being taken for their benefit.

THE RUINS OF SAN FRANCISCO.

[Extracted from the ATLANTIC MONTHLY, of April 10th, 2865.]

TOWARDS the close of the 19th century the city of San Francisco was totally engulfed by an earthquake. Although the whole coast line must have been much shaken, the accident seems to have been purely local, and even the city of Oakland escaped. Schwappelfurt, the celebrated German geologist, has endeavored to explain this singular fact by suggesting that there are some things the earth cannot swallow—a statement that should be received with some caution, as exceeding the latitude of ordinary geological speculation.

Historians disagree in the exact date of the calamity. Tulu Krish, the well-known New Zealander, whose admirable speculations on the ruins of St. Paul as seen from London Bridge have won for him the attentive consideration of the scientific world, fixes the occurrence in A. D. 1880. This, supposing the city to have been actually founded in 1850, as asserted, would give but thirty years for it to have assumed the size and proportions it had evidently attained at the time of its destruction. It is not our purpose, however, to question the conclusions of the justly-famed Maorian philosopher. Our present business lies with the excavations that are now being prosecuted by order of the Hawaiian Government upon the site of the lost city.

Every one is familiar with the story of its discovery. For many years the bay of San Francisco had been famed for the luscious quality of its oysters. It is stated that a dredger one day raked up a large bell, which proved to belong to the City Hall, and led to the discovery of the cupola of that building. The attention of the Government was at once directed to the spot. The bay of San Francisco was speedily drained by a system of patent syphons, and the city, deeply imbedded in mud, brought to light after a burial of many centuries. The City Hall, Post Office, Mint and Custom House were readily recognized by the large full-fed barnacles which adhered to their walls. Shortly afterwards the first skeleton was discovered, that of a broker, whose position in the upper strata of mind nearer the surface, was supposed to be owing to the exceeding buoyancy or inflation of scrip which he had secured about his person while endeavoring to escape. Many skeletons, supposed to be those of females, encompassed in that peculiar steel coop or cage, which seems to have been worn by the women of that period, was also found in the upper stratum. Alexis Von Puffer, in his admirable work on San Francisco, accounts for the position of these unfortunate creatures, by asserting that the steel cage was originally the frame of a parachute-like garment which distended the skirt, and in the submersion of the city prevented them from sinking. "If anything," says Von Puffer, "could have been wanting to add intensity to the horrible catastrophe which took place as the waters first entered the city, it would have been furnished in the forcible separation of the sexes at this trying moment. Buoyed up by their peculiar garments, the female population instantly ascended to the surface. As the drowning husband turned his eyes above, what must have been his agony as he saw his wife shooting upward, and knew that he was debarred the privilege of perishing with her? To the lasting honor of the male inhabitants be it said that but few seem to have availed themselves of their wives' superior levity. Only one skeleton was found still grasping the ankles of another in their upward journey to the surface."

For many years California had been subject to slight earthquakes, more or less generally felt, but not of sufficient importance to awaken anxiety or fear. Perhaps the absorbing nature of the San Franciscans' pursuits of gold getting, which metal seems to have been valuable in those days, and actually used as a medium of currency, rendered the inhabitants reckless of all other matters. Everything tends to show that the calamity was totally unlooked for. We quote the graphic language of Schwappelfurt:

"The morning of the tremendous catastrophe probably dawned upon the usual restless crowd of gold-getters intent upon their several avocations. The streets were filled with the expanded figures of gaily-dressed women, acknowledging with coy glances the respectful salutations of beaux as they gracefully raised their remarkable cylindrical head-coverings, a model of which is still preserved in the Honolulu Museum. The brokers had gathered at their respective temples. The shopmen were exhibiting their goods. The idlers or "Bummers"—a term applied to designate an aristocratic, privileged class who enjoyed immunities from labor and from whom a majority of the rulers are chosen—were listlessly regarding the promenaders from the street corners or the doors of their bibulous temples. A slight premonitory thrill runs through the city. The busy life of this restless microcosm is arrested. The shopkeeper pauses as he elevates the goods to bring them into a favorable light, and the glib professional recommendation sticks on his tongue. In the drinking saloon the glass is checked half way to the lips; on the streets the promenade-ers pause. Another thrill and the city begins to go down, a few of the more persistent toppers tossing off their liquor at the same moment. Beyond a terrible sensation of nausea, the crowds who now throng the streets do not realize the extent of the catastrophe. The waters of the bay recede at first from the centre of depression, assuming a concave shape, the outer edge of the circle towering many thousand feet above the city. Another convulsion, and the water instantly resumes its level. The city is smoothly engulfed nine thousand feet below, and the regular swell of the Pacific calmly rolls over it. Terrible," says Schwappelfurt, in conclusion, "as the calamity must have been, in direct relation to the individuals immediately concerned therein, we cannot but admire its artistic management: the division of the catastrophe into three periods, the completeness of the cataclysms and the rare combination of sincerity of intention with felicity of execution."

THE VENDUE OF JEFFERSON DAVIS.

THE CAUSE.

OF all the tyrants whose actions swell
The pages of history, and tell
How well they fought, and how brave they fell
In battle assault or seige, pell mell,
Or blew up their foes and themselves as well,
By way of a general ridding,
Commend us to Jefferson D. who spread
On the "outer wall" a flag of red,
And called to an auction sale instead
The wretches who did his bidding.

And yet, so fickle's the human mind,
In fact or fiction you'll always find
The popular taste is most inclined
To the traitor that's most consistent,
And the standard drama declares the fact
That he ought to die with his weapon back't,
Or fall on his sword in the final act,
As Brutus once did in his tent.

Laugh at the principle if you will,
One feels a kind of indefinite thrill
For the hunted pirate who covers still O'er his magazine with an iron will
And a pistol cocked and loaded,
And knows that capture will bring the flush,
The swift upheaval, and awful crash,
The blinding smoke and the sullen splash,
But never dreamed of selling for cash,
As certain people we know did.
Alas! that the theory and the rash
Example are both exploded.

No doubt that Samson essayed to crown
In some such manner his life's renown
In that final act which they say brought down
The house on his last appearance,
Or, if further illustrations you lack,
I've been keeping the scorpion figure back,
Who, girdled with fire, is never slack
In effecting his mortal clearance.

But there are skeptical folk who doubt
If Jefferson Davis really sold out,
On the eve of his final defeat and rout,
Such trifles as pots and kettles,
Or ever his proud soul stooped so low,
While girdling his loins for a final blow,
To lend himself to a Yankee show,
Whose very detail belittles,
And call the tale a canard—as near
What really is genuine and sincere
As the duck of Vaucanson might appear
To the one that digests its victuals.

But ah! the poet, whose prophet eyes
Can look through the battle-clouds that rise,
Sees not the traders who sacrifice
Such homely trifles as housewives prize,
But a symbol of something greater—
The selling out of a mansion built
On the soil where a Nation's blood is spilt,
With Fate for an auctioneer, and Guilt
Close by, an amazed spectator.

To such there comes a terrible awe,
To think that the people who gathered saw
The mighty arm of some Northern Thor
Uplifting the auction hammer,
And knocking down with each terrible blow
Some things that the catalogue didn't show,
In words that the reader will find below
Mixed up with the vendor's clamor:

THE SALE.

"Going, gentlemen!—going, gone!
The entire furniture, slightly worn,
And the family portraits these walls adorn,
Well worthy of any man's—hanging;
And some English carpets as good as new,
A little down-trodden, but then they'll do
If you let Grant shake 'em and put 'em through
The usual beating and hanging!

"Who bids for a genealogical tree—
A beautiful piece of embroidery,
A very first family's pedigree?
What a chance for our youthful scions!
Who bids? As the article's useless now
I'll take—five dollars!—too bad, I vow!
Well, put it in greenbacks! What name? eh, how?
Ah, beg your pardon!—'Lord Lyons'!

"A family bible I offer next,
Which opens itself at a certain text
About Onesimus that once vexed
The church as a casus belli;
And all those passages stricken out
Which provoke research in this age of doubt:
How much?—Ah, thank you?—'tis yours, my stout Old Cardinal—Antonelli!

"Now here's an article one might skip,
But the lot goes together—a driver's whip,
And, barring some stains on the thong and tip,
It's still in complete preservation:
Who bids? where's the man who's afraid to speak loud?
What, you, little white-coat, just back in the crowd,
With yellow moustachios and bearing so proud!
Going, gone!—to the Austrian Legation!

"Going, gentlemen—going, gone!
The household gods of a man forlorn,
For the benefit of the wives that mourn,
And of children's children, yet unborn,
And of bonds that none shall sever;
The house, and all that the house contains,
The wandering ghosts and their vengeful manes,
The naked walls and their blot and stains,
And even the title that now obtains
With an U. S. Grant forever!"

THEATRICAL TALK.

BUSINESS at the Opera House has been wonderfully good for Lent.

On Monday, the Magnolia was played for the last time for the benefit of the translator.

Tuesday, Nine Points of the Law and A Bull in a China Shop filled the bill.

On Wednesday, after the mild domestic drama of Rachel the Reaper, the new local farce, Dr. Slop-Pot-Tea, by the author of Assessments, or, Look after My Josephine, Do You Know Jones? and numerous other dramatic perpetrations, was produced. It made the audience laugh most consumedly, therefore it may be reckoned a successful "screaming farce." Its chief merit is that it hits the humor of the time. "Felix Squizzlem, M. D." (Harry Courtaine) having but a small practice, takes the advice of his negro servant, "Pete," (Barry), and taking his cue from the prevailing mania for consulting Chinese physicians, assumes the cue and dress of a Mongolian doctor, and under the title of "Dr. Slop-Pot-Tea," commences to practice upon the credulity of the citizens of San Francisco. Pete acts as his interpreter; Leonidas Brutus Carverho Squizzlem has told his wife that he intends to go to Placerville to attend to the practice of Dr. Guzzlebosh during his absence. Patients flock to consult Dr. Slop-Pot-Tea who would have no confidence in Felix Squizzlem, M. D., and everything goes well until "Mrs. Squizzlem," (Mrs. Perry), comes in with a lady friend, "Mrs. Comstockledge," (Miss Belle Land,) to consult the famous Chinese doctor, and discovers him to be her Squizzlem. This is the denouement of this amusing trifle. The appearance of Harry Courtaine as a Chinaman convulsed the audience with laughter, and they also laughed heartily while he sang a most pathetic and doleful Chinese ballad, the accompaniment to which was played by the orchestra on Chinese fiddles, tum-tums and gongs. I always wish to give credit where it is due, and therefore take much pleasure in stating that I have discovered that Mr. J. L. Schmidt, the leader of the orchestra composed the beautiful Chinese music to which the ballad was sung.

On Thursday, the Ellsworth Zouave Cadets took a benefit, which must have bountifully replenished their coffers. The house was crowded to its utmost capacity. The performance commenced with Boucicault's drama, Jeannie Deans. It was admirably played. Mr. Wheatleigh's "Counsellor Fairbrother" was a superb piece of acting; Harry Courtaine was wonderfully effective as "Geordie Robertson;" Mrs. Sophie Edwin in "Jeannie Deans" finds a character peculiarly suited to her, and in her enaction of it left nothing to be desired. Mrs. Perry, as "Effie Deans," gained immense applause, and the other characters were very well sustained. I do not think it will be a great while before the "pretty chrysalis," as the Call styles Miss Clarkson, shows the wings of the butterfly, judging from her rendering of "Madge Wildfire." I hope she will not fly away when matured.

The better the day the better the deed, thought Manager Maguire when he chose Good Friday for giving a benefit to Mrs. Pink, whose little girl was in June last burned to death while performing at the Opera House. Jeannie Deans and Slop Pot-Tea were announced as the evening's entertainment. Mr. Harry Courtaine, however, being very ill all day, suffering much from bad spirits, Dominique the Deserter had to be substituted for Dr. Slop-Pot-Tea. To-night the Colleen Bawn will be played. On Monday Mr. Charles Wheatleigh will take his first benefit. The public will, I am sure, be glad to testify their appreciation of the pains he has taken to afford them amusement during the last few weeks, by giving him a bumper benefit. Mr. Charles Thorne will on this occasion make his first appearance since his return from China. The play will be The Octoroon, with Wheatleigh as "Salem Scudder" and Thorne as "Jacob McClusky." Easter Monday. The Octoroon and Wheatleigh's benefit! Surely Maguire's Opera House will be well filled. Sybilla; or, Step by Step—a play which had a successful run in London and New York—is announced as being in active preparation.

On Tuesday next, Miss Heron will leave her appreciative Virginian friends and return to San Francisco. About the week after next she will commence a farewell engagement of a few nights.

The Eureka Minstrel Hall has been doing anything but a brilliant business during the past week, although the entertainment given has been a pleasing one, and the choruses, in particular, so fine that no lover of good vocal music could fail to be satisfied. The musical element is there, but I think the one thing lacking is the funny element. Taylor is a good "end-man," but people will make "odorous" comparisons, and sigh for the departed Billy Birch.

The American Theatre opened on Tuesday last with a good company. Chief among a constellation of stars shone the bright Worrell sisters, Jennie, Sophie and Irene. The grand burlesque spectacle of the Elves was produced in splendid style with magnificent scenery, new music and local songs. This afternoon and evening the fairy spectacle of Cinderella and the nautical drama of Black-eyed Susan will be produced. This company comprises considerable comedy talent in the persons of Mrs. Judah, Fred Franks and little Jennie Worrell. The prices have been placed at such a low figure—50 and 25 cents—that it will be indeed strange if the fine entertainment given does not nightly draw a fine house. The scenery is new throughout, having been painted expressly for this season by Mr. Torning.

A paper after the style of the Paris Figaro Programme is to make its appearance on Monday; it will publish the bill of the play at the Opera House and the programme of the opera at the Academy of Music, when the season commences, and be circulated in both houses. Its title will be Figaro.

TOUCHSTONE.

LOCAL AND INTERIOR ITEMS.

An affray occurred at Dayton, Nevada, between V. D. Flint and P. L. Moon, in which the latter was killed.

Richard Kneale, convicted of killing Robert Kneale, in Grass Valley, has been sentenced to ten years imprisonment.

Thirty-two lodges of Good Templars, (a temperance order,) have been organized in this State during the past six months.

The California Grand Lodge I. O. O. F. will meet in San Francisco, May 2d.

A prize fight took place near Virginia, Nevada, recently, between Foy and Kelleher. Thirty nine rounds were fought; Foy won the money, though the other took the "belt"-ing.

The Supreme Court having decided there was no help for it, the Board of Supervisors have reluctantly issued bonds for $400,000 in accordance with the subscription of the city and county of San Francisco to the stock of the Central Pacific Railroad.

The Monitor Cutmanche has not yet obtained its full complement of men—a chance for a few of the street-corner grumblers at "hard times and nothing to do." Others desiring constant employment can secure it by starting a newspaper.

Geo. E. Rolland has withdrawn from the Stockton Record, E. O. Judd becoming sole editor and proprietor. Mr. Judd is an old type, and knows how to get up a paper at once a faithful Record and an entertaining visitor—better still, "that which he knoweth, the same doeth he."

Superintendent Swain, of the Mint, has withdrawn the resignation which he had placed in the hands of the Department. He was urged to continue in the position by all the bankers and many of the merchants of the city, and also by a despatch from Secretary McCullough.

Inasmuch as the rebellion is believed to be about ended, Gov. Low has concluded not to call for the Ninth and Tenth Regiments of California troops, as recently contemplated. Infantry for "the next war," will continue to organize, however, Governor or no Governor.

Lieut. Lafferty and detachment surprised Mason, the murderer, whose crimes and escapes have made him notorious in the southern part of the State, at the head of Panoche valley, April 12th; the villain made the most desperate attempt to escape, and finally succeeded, but not until his horse was shot and himself badly wounded in the hip by a shot from the Lieutenant's pistol.

ONE CRY.

I AM tired! No one knows
Save God and I
How the wild wind blows,
Piercing my tender breast
With its icy blast,
Tears my heart, and makes unrest
Bend my spirit with the past
Like a spear in a cruel hand.

How I suffer! No one heeds
Save God and I.
How this poor heart bleeds,
And these bitter life-waves surge
With torturing strength,
Singing a mocking dirge
Which will end at length
In sheer mockery when I'm at rest!

MY FIRST BRIEF.

IN TWO PARTS.—PART FIRST.

"TAKE my advice, Hector, old fellow, and travel, if travel you must, on this side of the Atlantic. Fortune has knocked at the door of your chambers at last; but if you are not back by November, you will lose your chance," said one of my friends and fellow-barristers, as he bade me good-by on the platform at Euston Square. Sound counsel, probably, but thrown away on the recipient, as my mind was made up, and it was too late to change it.

I am a member of the Inner Temple—in my case a barren honor, since, during the years that had elapsed since my call, I had been numbered among the briefless. Not that I am one of those forensic amateurs who have no wish to toil, and who embrace the profession as jauntily as they would enter a club. On the contrary, I have both a desire and an aptitude for work, coupled with a laudable ambition for chief justiceships and puisne judgeships, if not for the woolsack itself. Mine was an instance—by no means, I fear, a solitary one—of a gentleman whose sole requirement was to be employed and kept to hard labor, and whose modest aspirations were thwarted by flinty-hearted attorneys. Imagine, then, the half incredulous delight with which I received from Nailer and Clutchit, of Chancery Lane, my retainer in the great case of Whittle vs. Wotherspoon. The hearing had been fixed for the autumn term, so I had ample time to study this deeply interesting process in all its bearings. Study it I did accordingly, and with all the ardor of a novice. I carefully read, and copiously annotated, four bagfuls of papers and parchments. I served up the great case at breakfast, lunch and dinner, and even in my dreams I was haunted by Whittle vs. Wotherspoon. I prepared a thrilling speech, ransacked legal libraries, and practiced myself in extracting the truth from an unwilling witness by daily subjecting my clerk to a most severe cross-examination with reference to trunancies and speculations hitherto disregarded.

At last my health began to suffer from confinement and over-fatigue, and I reflected that I was thoroughly master of my client's affairs, and that a long vacation intervened between the present moment and the hour of my forensic triumph. I resolved to relax my intellect, and brace my nerves by travel, and a happy inspiration suggested the New World as the scene of my holiday ramble. In spite, therefore, of my friend's well-meant counsel, I embarked at Liverpool, and the Cunard steamer making a fine summer passage, on the eleventh day my feet were treading the dusty pavement of New York. It was, however, what Americans call the "heated term," and the upper ten thousand were at Saratoga and other watering-places. My stay at the gigantic metropolitan hotel was therefore short, and having visited the falls, Washington, Philadelphia, and the other principal lions of the North, I was eager to explore the South, not at that time torn by civil war.

My plan—one usual with British travellers—was to steam down the Ohio and Mississippi, to tarry awhile in New Orleans, to make some stay at St. Louis, and thence to make some excursion long enough to entitle me through life to speak authoritatively on prairies, Indians and buffalo hunting. Afterwards I intended to scamper through the Gulf States, and notably that South Carolina which was already showing the armed head of secession. To be sure, time began to run short with me, seeing that I had lingered in the North longer than was prudent, and I should have but just sufficient time to hasten back to New York, and embark, that I might reach London early in November. The great case of Whittle vs. Wotherspoon was to come on in that month. Making my way by railroad to Cincinnati, therefore, I devoted but twenty-four hours to the queen city of the West, her pigs, patriots, caucuses, and timber-flats, and finally embarked upon the broad Ohio in the Henry Clay steamboat.

The Henry Clay was a fine vessel of her class; her cabin was as full of looking-glasses, gilding and polished bird's-eye maple as a French café; her hurricane deck was a promenade of enviable smoothness; and the ladies' pavilion was sufficiently replete with ormolu, buhl and silk curtains to have made a boudoir for a princess. The cook was a clever mulatto, the waiters and stewards were the most nimble of darkies, and the table equipage was only too bright and spotless to suit the habits of the company. So far all was good; and although I am sure that extravagant fires were kept up in the engine-room, while I had reason to suspect that the safety-valve was screwed down to prevent inconvenience, still no accident occurred, and the speed was undeniable. But the company! Well, perhaps I had no reason to complain, but it seemed to me that we had on board more than our fair complement of "Western pioneers," of "sportsmen"—which last word implies something very different in America from its British signification—and of "native raw material."

I will not deny that there were some passengers of good manners and breeding—some highly-educated New Englanders, one or two dashing Virginian gentlemen, who looked and spoke like genuine descendants of Charles II.'s cavaliers, and a couple of lemon-complexioned ladies from the South, who had the taste and elegance of Parisians. But the majority consisted of very queerly-dressed and odd-mannered people. So much the better, thought I, as I whipped out my note-book and patent pencil. If the Americans were modelled after the standard of Old World propriety, who would care to visit them? Thus ran my reflections; their originality, their startling notions of etiquette, are the very attractions that lure the traveller amongst them. I made notes accordingly, and conversed freely with all comers; and the mass of information I received, though compressed into shorthand, actually overflowed my notebook. So various as it was, too; so bewildering in its contradictions!

Dr. Simon Coffin, of Connecticut, assured me that the South did not dare to go beyond words, and that, with Lincoln for President, every colored person in the slave States would be emancipated within a year, or that New England would know the reason why. Colonel Titus Fletcher, of Alabama, was quite of a different opinion; according to him, the South did dare anything and everything, would "conquer the cowardly North, sir, in sanguineous conflict, and hang old Abe Lincoln, sir, as high as Julius Caesar, or any other nigger-worshipping despot who should put a slight on our Southern chivalry, sir." And a third, senator Pudsey, of Maryland, differed radically from the colonel in all things, while flatly denying every word the doctor chose to utter. So far, my part was that of a mere spectator, but before long, though I was still unconscious, the curtain rose upon a drama in which I was most unwittingly to play the principal character.

At Clarksville, in the State of Indiana, there came on board an individual apparently in weak health, for he was huddled up in a camel cloak, with the collar turned up to his ears, in spite of the excessive sultriness of the weather; he leaned on a cane, and carried something that looked like a portable medicine chest, secured by one of Hobbs' patent locks. This person was dressed in black, of course, a l'Américaine; he had a long, lean face, an innocent brown wig that made little or no pretence to be anything but a wig, and blue spectacles. He was hard of hearing, and amazingly silent for a Yankee. I have thus attempted to sketch the portrait of a most unprepossessing personage, apparently sixty years old, infirm in health, and morose in temper. Who could have conjectured that my destiny hinged on the actions of that ungainly fellow-passenger, or that my brilliant prospects—poor legal Almaschar that I was—were to be dashed to ruin by the casual conduct of a lean old traveller in a brown wig?

I am myself a believer in the theory of presentiments, and I affirm on my honor as a Templar, that I felt a strong antipathy towards this man from the very moment of his unlucky arrival. And yet he did nothing to provoke such a sentiment. He was not quarrelsome, or censorious, or reckless in the disposal of tobacco juice, as many of my fellow-pilgrims were. Even his deafness, though secluded him from social intercourse, gave no annoyance to others. To be sure, when any loquacious New Englander endeavored to elicit his personal history by means of questions, the efforts which he made to comprehend were painful to witness, and his replies had something of the snappish character not unusual to the deaf; but at other times he would sit among a number of talkers, putting his hand at intervals, trumpet fashion, to his ear, and struggling hard to catch some scraps of the general conversation. But he never volunteered an observation, and was speedily left alone as a hopeless case.

Once I fancied that I saw the deaf traveller whispering to a negro steward in the cabin doorway, and I thought that the black started and laid his fingers on his lips when he caught sight of a white man approaching, but this may have been mere accident. Once or twice, too, this strange-looking being hovered about me as I stood alone on the hurricane-deck, blinked at me curiously over his blue glasses, and seemed on the point of addressing me, but ended by wheeling round with a growl, as some one else came sauntering up from the cabins. Repulsive as the aspect of the voyager was, I once or twice mustered sufficient charity to accost him, but on each occasion we happened to be seated at the public dinner or breakfast table, and an inarticulate muttering, accompanied by the application of the hand to his ear, was the only reply. At last the man went on his way, somewhat to my relief, and I saw no more of him.

This event, I have since had cause to remember, occurred at Shawnee-town, on the right or Illinois shore of the river. We were all at breakfast, seated at long tables, and deep in the enjoyment of hot waffle cakes, hominy, turkey, molasses, venison-steaks, coffee, crackers, fish, pumpkin pies and iced water, when a voice in the doorway announced Shawnee-town, and forthwith the deaf gentleman jumped up as if he had divined the sound with unwonted sagacity, caught up his hat from the stand which it shared with fifty others, and shuffled on deck, followed by a grinning deputy steward with his valise and medicine chest. Our stoppage was brief; no one else left the steamer at that obscure place, and our breakfast was not interrupted.

When my hunger was appeased, I rose like the rest, scrambled for my hat, found it, put it on, and went on deck. Nothing remarkable happened. The stream was with us, the Henry Clay went like a snake through the water, and in a few hours we passed the free State of Illinois, and had Missouri on our right, and Kentucky, as before, on our left. In passing some red bluffs of sandstone rock, which Mrs. General Brake, of Osage county, took pains to assure me were considered, by competent judges, to whip all European scenery to trash, a gust of wind from among these bepraised cliffs blew my hat off, and but for the dexterity of a gentleman in front of me it would have been lost in the river. However, Captain Hiram Greenpole caught the truant hat in his bony fingers at the moment when it was clearing the rail to fall overboard. Would that it had! Alas that it was not permitted to float idly down the yellow Mississippi, a nest for the kungfisher, or a plaything for baby alligators! Perhaps, had that hat become flotsam and jetsam, on the Father of Waters, the dark web of my destiny might not have suffered the excision of its brightest strand. I may have lost wealth and honor, Britain a legislator, England a judge, through that unfortunate rescue.

It was evident by Captain Hiram's smiling face and polite gestures that he was actuated by the very best of motives, when suddenly, as he gazed upon the hat which he was about to restore to me, his countenance became overcast, and a long whistle broke from his compressed lips. Then he eyed me sternly, glanced at the hat again, frowned more decidedly than before, showed the unlucky chapeau to two or three lounging Southerners who stood near, and straightway drew upon me the scrutiny of as many pairs of suspicious eyes. All this occupied but a moment, yet it was unaccountable to me, and I began to wonder whether the captain were mad, or whether some wanton insult were intended. I came forward, naturally enough, to reclaim my property.

"I am much obliged to you, Captain Greenpole," said I, as affably as could be expected, "for kindly saving my hat."

"You own to it then, sir?" said the militiaman, lifting the ruffled article of attire high in the air. "Am I to understand that you own to it?"

"Own to it!"—an odd phrase, thought I. However, I said that I was the owner, and that I was obliged for the hat's preservation; and with that I gently withdrew it from his grasp.

"You heard that, Wilson, Ellis, Heckermann? and you, Dr. Jabez Cook?" asked the restorer of my hat, in a thrilling voice.

"We did. We'll testify, sure as death! What's more, we saw for ourselves. That does flog all!"

Such were the several rejoinders of the four passengers whose ocular testimony had been appealed to; but why, I knew not, nor could I guess. I had heard that Americans in the far west were somewhat peculiar in their behavior, and I set down Captain Hiram's melodramatic tone to a mere love of mystery and importance. Little did I dream that I should ere long be terribly undeceived. I went aft. The glare of the sun threw a flood of yellow light on the broad and tawny river, on the long trains of rafts that floated down with the current, on the broad-horns pulling along closer to shore, and on the sand-bars, and shoals, and trees half submerged, through the midst of which our skilful pilot was guiding our course with an unerring precision. The engines panted and hurried, the sharp bows cut their eager way through the turbid water, and the German musicians of the band struck up one of their lively waltz tunes. Everything on board told of life and motion, and the go-ahead determination in which America has long been deemed to excel; yet I was depressed by a feeling for which I could not reasonably account. It may have been merely the effect of the strange scenery—the gloomy cypresses, the black pines, the tangled swamps, the maize fields, tobacco patches, and "barrens,"—that contrasted so forcibly with the aspect of my native land, and reminded me that I was, after all, far from home, and a friendless stranger.

But this melancholy mood soon passed away, and I found myself in good spirits, and free of fancy, as before. However, if I was unchanged, a great and disagreeable alteration soon became visible in the demeanor of the rest of the passengers on board the Henry Clay. Wherever I looked I saw scowling brows, saturnine glances, looks of alarm, of hate, of scorn, and I know not how many other unamiable sentiments, unmistakably levelled at me. Yes, at me, Hector Phelps, barrister-at-law. Unwittingly I had become the bête noire of the steamboat. I approached Mrs. General Brake, who in the morning had been very gracious indeed to the travelling Briton, but now she gathered up her skirts as if there were contamination in my contact, and turned away with a look of the most withering contempt.

Nor was this lady the only one of my former acquaintances who gave me the cold shoulder. Professor Harvey Blouse, one of the most learned botanists in the South, and Natural Philosophy Lecturer at Columbia University, hissed out the word "serpent," with a sibilant drawl that emulated the rattlesnake itself, and retreated into his sleeping-den. Miss Billiter, the belle of the boat, around whom sighed and languished a dozen sallow young gentlemen in satin waistcoats, turned from me with a little scream as I drew near. Even old Abraham Wells, the Philadelphia Quaker, scuttled away from me as if I had been plague-stricken. I saw Hiram Greenpole the centre of a group of most animated debaters, who talked and gesticulated, and pointed at me, and jerked their heads at me, and muttered and frowned like a set of stage conspirators.

Yes, I was the object of all this turmoil, of all this disgust, this loathing, this alarm and execration. And why? In the name of justice and sound sense, why? I had done nothing. I had in no way infringed the rules of even American etiquette. In politics I had been guarded and Erastian enough to satisfy the veriest time-server alive. And yet I was marked out as the object of scorn, dislike, and a sort of fear on the part of every one I beheld. In vain I asked myself the reason. But the fact was patent enough. I am not a nervous man, nor one of those vain persons who imagine themselves the centre of attraction to an indifferent universe. Neither can I be classed with those unhappy persons whose thin-skinned sensitiveness leads them to declare, with Scrub, that they must have been the subject of discussion, because the speakers "laughed consumedly." In my case nobody laughed; but looks sour and dark enough to presage an evil ending to the affair met my bewildered gaze on every hand.

It may, perhaps, be asked why I did not boldly confront the tacit accusation of the crowd, declare my innocence, and, in a word, take the bull by the horns. Alas! he who could ask such a question little knows the intricacies of human nature, or how impossible it is to convict the many-headed of injustice. Cicero himself would have recoiled from such an ordeal as that of addressing the motely passengers of an American steamer on the subject of their unfriendly mien. I had no alternative but to wait till the popular caprice should be at an end. But my troubles were but beginning. There were on board two smart young negroes—servants, as they were euphuistically styled, of a family going down to some place in Mobile. These two black lads had been very chatty and communicative, and when I found the white passengers so abruptly indisposed for my society, I walked forward for a gossip with my sable brethren. Yes, there was Scip, and there was Telemachus, mounting guard, as usual, over Massa's bloodhound, and Missy's parrot, and young Missy's guitar-case, and other portable possessions.

But scarcely had I begun to converse with my smiling black friends before Colonel Budge strode angrily up and desired to know "how I dared to tamper with his negroes?" But for the very singular behavior of the other passengers, I should have fancied that the colonel had been imbibing mint juleps too freely in the barkeeper's cabin; but, as it was, I naturally grew hurt and indignant.

"What do you mean, sir, by such unwarrantable language?" I inquired, I dare say very savagely; but at any rate the little wizened field officer looked desperately frightened, and he skipped away as nimbly as a dancing-master.

Presently I saw a portly lady, Mrs. Budge, advance, leaning on the arm of a gaunt planter, and escorted by a body-guard of two more. I thought she was coming to apologize for her consort's rudeness, but never was there a more unhappy conjecture.

"Scipio! Telemachus!" cried Mrs. Budge, in a deep, hollow voice, like that of a tragic actress, "go to the negro cabin this moment. If I see you speak again to this—this individual, you shall have such chastisement as a cowhide can inflict."

It was evident, to judge by the haste with which the two classic youths hurried their dark skins out of the presence, that Mrs. Colonel Budge was a woman of her word.

"Really, madam," said I, "you must be laboring under some extraordinary misconception: Your conduct, preceded by the insulting remarks of Colonel Budge, entitles me to ask the reason of—"

"Ask your own conscience, sir," said the lady with terrible emphasis, at which I started in spite of myself.

"Come away, madam. Pray, Mrs. Budge, let me persuade you to retire!" cried the gaunt planter, very hot and excited. "We shall presently bring this affair to a reckoning; but it is not fit that a delicate matron should endure the ignominy of conversing with an incendiary."

They hastened away to where the assembled passengers, huddled together like cattle, were looking on. Nor did I make any effort to follow them. My brains were in a whirl. I knew not whether to believe myself drunk or dreaming, or to imagine myself the inmate of a floating asylum for lunatics. An incendiary! Such was the singular epithet applied to me, apparently in sober earnest, by a grave, gray-haired man. Incendiary! What had I done to be classed with rick-burners and illicit fire-raisers?—I, a harmless foreign traveller, and a member of one of the learned professions? Surely, thought I, there must be some strange mistake; unless, indeed, I am the victim of calumny. But I had no enemy in the New World—consciously, at least; and although a wild thought did cross my mind to the effect that my unjust persecution might be due to the machinations of the malignant Wotherspoon, I quickly dismissed the conjecture as absurd. After all, however vindictive and subtle the defendant in the great case of Whittle vs. Wotherspoon might be, however anxious to extinguish the legal luminary secured by the opposite party, I could scarcely imagine the Sheffield manufacturer capable of inspiring with his hostile sentiments a whole caravan of Western Americans. No, the matter remained in my mind a moot point.

Meanwhile, I could observe that I continued to attract the most lively attention on the part of my fellow-passengers. Had I been a wild beast, I could not, as I walked the deck, have had a wider berth or more ample elbow room conceded to me. Moreover, I presently perceived that a division had taken place among the passengers, severing their number into two distinct camps. The majority—and in America a majority is everything—consisted of undoubted Southerners, sallow, fiery eyed, and unfriendly of mien. The minority included all the little knots of bag-men, jobbers, surveyors, doctors, editors, and dealers in "notions," whose nativity was due to New England, to Maine, to Vermont, and other down-east States. The former assemblage looked at me, to use a popular idiom, as though they would eat me. The latter eyed me as if I were a Jonah, whose immediate sacrifice would be the only possible manner of bringing matters to a satisfactory termination; and there was more irritation mingled with their fear than need have existed. Really, really, this was a strange, a most painful position.

But I had little time for cogitation before fresh food for wonder was afforded me. I caught sight of a black woolly head peeping cautiously up the cabin stairs, of a pink-striped cotton jacket, a dirty napkin, a sable face expressing infinite concern and trepidation, and a pair of saucer-like eyes, rolling as they looked unutterable things at me. I saw that it was one of the negro stewards, Cæsar by name, who obviously desired to make some communication to my harassed self, without the knowledge of the company on deck. Down I went accordingly; and lo! there was Cæsar, with one swart finger laid mysteriously on his blubber lips, to indicate the necessity of caution. At another time I should have been amused, perhaps, at the ludicrous solemnity of the black man, contrasting, as it did, with his professional costume and napkin of office. But I was in anything rather than a jocular mood, and it was in the very sadness of seriousness that I asked the black steward what on earth was the matter.

To my surprise he began the conversation with a question: "Why massa come here?"

I made no answer, and the negro went on:

"Why massa come here, eh? Oh, berry, berry foolish thing—berry venturesome thing! Go put finger in big alligator's mouth, eh? Tink alligator no bite him off, eh, poor Massa 'Biram? Tink dey not know massa? Answer me dat!"

"Think they not know massa?" Here was a question more gratifying to any lurking vanity in my composition, perhaps, than satisfactory in the suggestions it evoked. Was it possible that I was more celebrated than I was aware of?—that my name was known in the Western Hemisphere, even before I had been able to display my talents in court? But, if so, whence the clear signs of the popular detestation? Surely I was not deserving of so much abhorrence. What had I done to earn the execration of the people of America? Could a hoax be intended? Impossible! And then, too, it flashed upon me that the negro had called me by a certain Biblical name, the like of which never was bestowed at baptism on a Phelps of the Leicestershire branch. He had called me "Massa 'Biram," meaning, doubtless, Abiram; and I was on the point of asking for an explanation, when my interlocutor shrunk away alarmed, as another man of color came shuffling out of the saloon, where the waiters were jingling the plates and glasses in preparation for dinner, and announced that the captain of the steamboat "wished to see me" at once, and in his own cabin.

"Massa best look sharp!" concluded the negro, with an ominous grin.

Deeming it wisest, under the circumstances, to waive all considerations of dignity, I hurried to the little state-room, which the captain of the Henry Clay called his own. I tapped smartly at the painted door. "Come in!" cried a high-pitched voice; and I found myself in presence of Captain Jonathan Willis.

DEATH OF MOZART.—There is something beautiful and touching in the circumstances of his death. His sweetest song, the last he sang, was the "Requiem." He had been employed on this exquisite piece for several weeks, his soul filled with the richest melody, and already claiming kindred with immortality. After giving it its last touch and breathing into it that audying spirit which was to concentrate it through all time as his "cygnean strain," he fell into a gentle and quiet slumber. At length, the light footsteps of his daughter, Emilie, awoke him. "Come hither, my Emilie," said he; "my task is done—the Requiem—my Requiem—is finished." "Say not so, my dear father," said the gentle girl, interrupting him, as tears stood in her eyes; "you must be better, for even now your cheek has a glow upon it. I am sure we will nurse you well again—let me bring you something refreshing."

"Do not deceive yourself, my love," said the dying father; this wasted form can never be recruited by human aid. From Heaven's mercy do I look for aid, in this my dying hour. You spoke of refreshment, my Emilie. Take these my last notes—sit down by the piano, here—sing them with the hymn of thy sainted mother—let me once more hear those tones which have so long been my solacement and delight." Emilie obeyed; and with a voice enriched with tenderer emotion, sung the following stanzas:

"Spirit! thy labor is o'er,
Thy term of probation is run,
Thy steps are now bound for the untrodden shore,
And the race of immortals begun.

"Spirit! look not on the strife
Or the pleasure of earth with regret
Pause not on the threshold of limitless life,
To mourn for the day that is set.

"Spirit! no fetters can bind,
No wicked have power to molest;
There the weary like thee, the wretched shall find
A heaven, a mansion of rest.

"Spirit! how bright is the road
For which thou art now on the wing;
Thy home it will be with thy Saviour and God,
Their loud hallelujahs to sing."

A PROFESSOR QUIZZED.—The celebrated Archbishop Whately wrote the following "supposed elegy" on the famous geologist Buckland:

Where shall we our great Professor inter,
That in peace may rest his bones?
If we hew him a rocky sepulchre,
He'll rise and break the stones,
And examine the stratum that lies around,
For he's quite in his element under ground.

If with mattock and spade his body we lay,
In the common alluvial soil,
He'll start up and snatch these tools away
Of his own geological toil;
In a stratum so young the Professor disdains
That embedded should lie his organic remains.

Then exposed to the drip of some case-hardening spring,
His carcase let stalactite cover,
And to Oxford the petrified sage let us bring,
When he is encrusted all over;
There, 'mid mammoths and crocodiles, high on a shelf,
Let him stand as a monument raised to himself.

MEXICAN MUMMIES.—It is stated from Mexico that there have been discovered in the State of Durango several grottoes containing a vast number of mummies in perfect preservation. According to the descriptions contained in the archives of the Mexican Scientific Commission, other very remarkable sepulchral grottoes have been found in the State of Oaxaca. Some of them had been pillaged at the time of the Conquest, owing to the avidity of the Spaniards and the too ardent zeal of the Dominicans who undertook to convert the province; yet many escaped this profanation, and the natives continued for a long time secretly to convey the bodies of their chiefs, the descendants of the priests of Mitla and of the Zapotak Kings, to these hallowed burial places, where not only the remains of those personages have been found, but also their images made of baked clay; and it is not improbable that their records may be found there too.

MOUNT HOOD IN THE EAST.—Bierstadt has lately finished a noble work, a view of Mt. Hood in Oregon. An exchange thus describes the picture:

A mountain standing by itself in majestic isolation, and rising to the height of eighteen thousand feet, three times the height of Mount Washington. Apparently, one-half of this magnificent mountain, as seen in Bierstadt's painting, is covered with snow. In the foreground is the Columbia River, with its wooded banks, while at the left of the picture is a shaded plain, on which a herd of deer is feeding. The vast size of this painting, its fine contrast between the life and verdure of the foreground, and the white icy desolation of the mountain itself, and the superb coloring and manipulation, all combine to make this one of the most striking landscapes in the annals of American art.

A GREAT soul is too much above injustice, ridicule or grief, to be touched by them, and would be invulnerable if it did not suffer through compassion.—La Bruyere.

RECORD OF THE CAMPAIGNS.

IT is a happiness to be able to state that, from all indications, the "record" is drawing near its final chapter. To read the glorious news that each day brings without being joyful evinces something worse than indifference. The faint of heart that in the hour of the Nation's danger stood by her bedside and hypocritically bemoaned her fate, yet offered no words of consolation or encouragement in her saddest hour, how feel they now? Their doubts and prophecies, what do they amount to? The Nation owes them nothing! Her faithful children, by their zeal and patriotism, nursed her and preserved her; and now behold her! filled with greater vigor and renewed strength, and fulfilling the divine mission of granting to all within her dominion the blessings of liberty. Let the news of the week speak for itself:

On the 9th of April the rebel Army of Northern Virginia, under command of Robert E. Lee, was surrendered to Lieut.-Gen. Grant. The following correspondence relating to the surrender is herewith preserved in the "Record" of THE CALIFORNIAN, as it will be a prominent record in the History of the United States for all time:

APRIL 7.—Gen. R. E. Lee, Commanding C. S. A.—GENERAL.—The result of last week must convince you of the hopelessness of further resistance on the part of the Army of Northern Virginia, in this struggle. I feel that it is so, and regard it as my duty to shift from myself the responsibility of any further effusion of blood by asking of you the surrender of that portion of the Confederate States Army, known as the Army of Northern Virginia. Very respectfully, your obedient servant.
U. S. GRANT, Lieut.-Gen.

APRIL 7.—Lieut.-Gen. Grant—GENERAL.—I have received your note of this date. Though not entirely of the opinion you express of the hopelessness of the further resistance on the part of the Army of Northern Virginia, I reciprocate your desire to avoid the useless effusion of blood, and therefore before considering your proposition ask the terms you will offer on condition of its surrender. R. E. LEE, Gen.

APRIL 7.—Gen. R. E. Lee, Commanding C. S. A.—GENERAL.—Your note of last evening, in reply to mine of the same date, asking the conditions on which I will accept the surrender of the Army of Northern Virginia, is just received. In reply, I would say, that peace being my first desire, there is but one condition I insist upon, viz.: That the men surrendered shall be disqualified from taking up arms against the Government of the United States until properly exchanged. I will meet you or designate officers to meet any officers you may name for the purpose of arranging definitely the terms upon which a surrender of the Army of Northern Virginia will be received. Very respectfully, your obedient servant,
U. S. GRANT, Lieut.-Gen.

APRIL 8.—General—I received at a late hour your note of to-day in answer to mine of yesterday. I did not intend to propose the surrender of the Army of Northern Virginia, but to ask the terms of your proposition. To be frank with you I do not think the emergency has arisen to call for the surrender of this army, but as the restoration of peace should be the sole object of all, I desire to know whether your proposals would tend to that end. I cannot, therefore, meet you with a view to a surrender of the Army of Northern Virginia, but so far as your proposition may affect the Confederate States forces under my command, and tend to the restoration of peace, I should be glad to meet you at 10 A. M. tomorrow on the old stage road to Richmond, between the picket lines of the two armies. Very respectfully, etc.,
R. E. LEE, General.

APRIL 9.—Gen. R. E. Lee, Commanding C. S. A.—Your note of yesterday is received. As I have no authority to treat on the subject of peace, the meeting proposed for 10 A. M. to-day could lead to no good. I will state, however, General, that I am equally anxious for peace with yourself, and the whole North entertain the same feeling. The terms upon which peace can be had are well understood by the South. Laying down their arms, they will hasten to that most desirable event, save thousands of human lives and hundreds of millions of property not yet destroyed. Sincerely hoping that all our difficulties may be settled without the loss of another man, I subscribe myself, very respectfully, your obedient servant,
U. S. GRANT, Lieut.-Gen.

APRIL 9.—General—I received your note of this morning on the picket line, whither I had come to meet you and ascertain definitely what terms were embraced in your proposition of yesterday with reference to the surrender of this army. I now request an interview in accordance with the offer contained in your letter of yesterday for that purpose.

Very respectfully, your obedient servant,
R. E. LEE, General.
To Lieut.-General U. S. Grant, Commanding U. S. Armies.

APRIL 9.—Gen. R. E. Lee, Commanding C. S. A.—Your note of this day is but this moment—11:50 A. M.—received, in consequence of my having passed from the Richmond and Lynchburg Road to the Farmville and Lynchburg Road. I am at this writing about four miles west of Walter's Church, and will push forward to the front for the purpose of meeting you. Notice sent to me on this Road where you wish the interview to take place will meet me. Very respectfully, your obedient servant,
U. S. GRANT, Lieut.-Gen.

Headquarters Armies of the United States, April 9, 4:30 P. M.—Hon. EDWIN M. STANTON, Secretary of War.—Gen. Lee surrendered the army of Northern Virginia this afternoon upon terms proposed by myself. The accompanying additional correspondence will show the conditions fully.
U. S. GRANT, Lieut.-Gen.

APPOINTMENT COURT HOUSE, April 9.—Gen. R. E. Lee, Commanding C. S. A.—In accordance with the substance of my letter to you of the 8th inst., I propose to receive the surrender of the army of Northern Virginia on the following terms, to wit:

Rolls of all the officers and men to be made in duplicate, one copy to be given to an officer designated by me, the other to be retained by such officer or officers as you may designate. The officers to give their individual parole not to take arms against the Government of the United States until properly exchanged, and each company or regiment commander to sign a like parole for the men of their commands. The arms, artillery and public property to be parked and stacked, and turned over to officers appointed by me to receive them. This will not embrace the side-arms of the officers nor their private horses or baggage. This done, each officer and man will be allowed to return to their homes, not to be disturbed by United States authority so long as they observe their parole and the laws in force where they may reside. Very respectfully,
U. S. GRANT, Lieut.-Gen.

HEADQUARTERS ARMY OF NORTHERN VIRGINIA, APRIL 9.—Lieut.-Gen. U. S. Grant, commanding United States Forces—GENERAL.—I have received your letter of this date, containing the terms of surrender of the army of Northern Virginia, as proposed by you. As they are substantially the same as those expressed in your letter of the 8th inst., they are accepted. I will proceed to designate the proper officers to carry the stipulations into effect. Very respectfully, your obedient servant,
R. E. LEE, General.

Immediately on receipt of these despatches, the Secretary of War telegraphed as follows to Gen. Grant:

WAR DEPARTMENT, WASHINGTON, April 9—9:30 P. M.—Lieut.-Gen. Grant—Thanks be to Almighty God for the great victory with which he has this day crowned you and the gallant army under your command. The thanks of this Department and the Government and of the people of the United States—their reverence and honor—have been deserved, and will be rendered to you and the brave and gallant Officers and Soldiers of your command for all time.
E. M. STANTON, Secretary of War.

Admiral Porter reports to the Navy Department the destruction of the rebel fleet on the James. With the exception of an unfinished ram (the Texas) and a small tug-boat the rebel rams and gun-boats were all blown up. They consisted of the following vessels: Virginian, flagship, with four guns, iron-clad; Richmond, four guns, iron-clad; Fred.ricksburg, four guns, iron-clad; Nansemond, two guns; the wooden ship Roanoke, one gun; a wooden torpedo tender and a school-ship. Some of these may be raised. The Tredegar works and Naval Ordnance depot were untouched.

It is rumored that Stoneman has cut the railroad between Danville and Greensboro, and that Sherman has occupied Raleigh.

Three companies of Moseby's guerrillas disbanded on Wednesday, at Culpepper, and dispersed for their homes. Moseby has less than 300 men, now mostly operating on the neck of land running down to Aquia Creek and Fredericksburg.

The New York Herald publishes a list of general officers surrendered by Lee. It comprises the General-in-Chief, 3 Lieutenant-Generals, 17 Major-Generals, 61 Brigadier-Generals, among them Anderson, Echols, Ewell, (already a prisoner) Finegan, Heath, Bushrod Johnson, Kershaw, Longstreet, Mahone, McCausland, Moseby, Ould, (the Exchange Commissioner) Pemberton, Pickett, Rosser, Sorrell and Henry A. Wise. The number of men actually surrendered by Lee is from 20,000 to 22,000. Within the past two weeks over 20,000 prisoners have been sent away from City Point. A large number are still there.

A despatch from Gen. Thomas, dated Nashville, April 11, gives intelligence that Selma (Ala.) was captured by Gen. Wilson's forces on the 22d ult. Forrest and Roddy, with their entire commands were captured. Our men dismounted, charged the entrenchments and carried all before them. Montgomery is also reported captured.

News from Mobile to the 4th, states that the siege progresses favorably. Rebel communication with Mobile is entirely suspended.

Sherman has notified his army commanders to be prepared for rapid marches. His army has been entirely re-equipped, and was ready to enter upon a new campaign for the extinguishment of Johnson's military power.

Lynchburg, Va., surrendered on the 11th, to a Lieutenant of Gen. Griffin's forces, at the head of a scouting party. McKenzie's brigade of cavalry has occupied the town to take care of public property.

THE Union's Paris correspondent says: "There is much alarm in the neighborhoods of Ætna and Vesuvius, as both these volcanoes are in a state of eruption, affording very grand spectacles for those who have no fear of being buried alive beneath burning lava. Near Ætna many estates have been overrun, as it is now a month since the fire and smoke have been bulging from its crater; but Vesuvius has only commenced within a few days. Many people are departing to witness the sight. The tops of the mountains are covered with snow, and in the evening brilliantly illuminated by the flames, while all day a dense volume of smoke is rising and filling the atmosphere far and wide."

FEELING is all in all! Name is sound and smoke clouding, Heaven's glow.

FLOWERS—THE HELIOTROPE.

A CELEBRATED writer says: "I love flowers, as forming one of the sweetest lines in the God-written poetry of Nature, as one of the universal blessings accessible to all nations, climes and classes—blessings in their own loveliness alone, and in the pleasure derivable from the contemplation of loveliness, but trebly blessing us in the familiar and beautiful power they possess of awakening in our hearts feelings of wonder, admiration, gratitude and devotion, teaching us to look from earth to Him who called it into existence, and to feel how worthy of our increasing thankful adoration must be that Being, the meanest of whose creations is so wonderfully, so beautifully adapted to its appointed position in the vast world! Flowers seem to form the easiest and pleasantest pathway to further love and knowledge of Nature's glories. They are indigenous to every soil and familiar to every eye—a universal language of love, beauty, poetry and wisdom, if we read them aright."

What flower more agreeable to the eye, or more prized for its exquisite odor than the Heliotrope—(Heliotropium Peruvianum) a native of Peru! The Orientals say that the perfumes of the heliotrope elevate their souls towards heaven; it is true, they exhilarate us and produce a degree of intoxication. The sensation produced by inhaling them may, it is said, be renewed by imagination, even though years have passed away after the reality was experienced. The Countess Eleanora, natural daughter of Christian IV., King of Denmark, who became so notorious by the misfortunes, crimes and exile of Count Ulfeld, her husband, offers to us a striking proof of the power of perfumes on the memory. This Princess at the age of thirteen had become attached to a young man to whom she was subsequently affianced. This young man died in the castle when they were making preparations for the marriage. Eleanora, in despair, wished to take a long, last look at the object of her love and, if alive, to bid a final adieu. She was conducted into the chamber where he had just expired. The body was already placed on a bier and covered with rosemary. The spectacle made such a deep impression upon the affianced maiden that, though she afterwards exhibited courage equal to her misfortunes, she never could breathe the perfume of rosemary without falling into frightful convulsions.

The celebrated Jessieu, while botanizing in the Cordilleras, suddenly inhaled the most exquisite perfume. He expected to find some brilliantly colored flowers, but only perceived some pretty clumps of an agreeable green, bearing flowers of a pale blue color. On approaching nearer he observed that the flowers turned gently toward the sun, which they appeared to regard with reverential love. Struck with this peculiar disposition, he gave the plant the name of "Heliotrope," which is derived from the Greek words signifying "Sun" and "I turn." The learned botanist, delighted with his charming acquisition, collected a quantity of the seeds and sent them to the Jardin du Roi, at Paris, where the plant was first cultivated in Europe. The ladies collected it with great enthusiasm, placed it in their richest vases, called it the "Flower of Love," and received with indifference every bouquet in which their favorite flower was not to be found. An anonymous writer has made it emblematical of flattery, as it is said that when a cloud obscures the sky it droops its head. We would rather suppose that, like the lover whose heart is sad when absent from his mistress, the Heliotrope droops because it is deprived of the cheering rays of the sun that it seems to adore.

"There is a flower whose modest eye
Is turned with looks of light and love,
Who breathes her softest, sweetest sigh
Where'er the sun is bright above.

Let clouds obscure or darkness veil,
Her fond idolatry is fed;
Her sighs no more their sweets exhale—
The loving eye is cold and dead.

Canst thou not trace a moral here,
False flatterer of the prosperous hour?
Let but an adverse cloud appear
And thou art faithless as the flower.

THE ELECTROPATHIC INSTITUTE, No. 645 Washington street, established February 12th, 1860, by an association of scientific gentlemen, for the cure of disease and the suppression of quackery.

Persons suffering from disease can rely upon the most scientific and honorable treatment at the above Medical Institute, and should their cases be within the limit of cure, the Resident Physician will warrant them a perfect and permanent relief from their affliction. And if their case be incurable, he will so state, and advise them of the best method of relief, so far as science can go to accomplish the object.

The basis of treatment at the Institute is the electro-pathic system; but the Resident Physician, J. H. JOSSELYN, M. D., being a graduate of the University of Pennsylvania, considers himself competent to treat with medicines, but, in no case, will he make use of mercurials, those life-destroying drugs; but, instead, will use the most approved vegetable remedies.

Since the establishment of the Institute, almost every nameable disease has been treated with success, especially those complaints which have been ill-treated by quacks, the names of which should never be printed in a newspaper.

Females should bear in mind, that the only safety in the treatment of complaints peculiar to their sex, is to have a physician who has made the female economy his particular study. In the resident physician at the Institute, they will find a surgeon who can sympathize with them in their troubles, and relieve them, no matter what they may be.

To the rheumatic and nervous person, this Institute offers the blessing of certain and permanent cure.

For those suffering from the effects of mercury, and those diseases for which mercury is usually given, there is no remedy so sure as the Electropathic system, as practiced at the Institute, 645 Washington street.

Come one, come all, and receive the blessings of health!

The motto is—a perfect cure or no money required! All letters answered with promptness and with pleasure, if directed to

ALLEN'S

LUNG BALSAM!

THE REMEDY FOR CURING

CONSUMPTION, COUGHS, COLDS,

ASTHMA, CROUP,

DISEASES OF THE THROAT, BRONCHITIS,

Pains and Oppression of the Chest or Lungs,

DIFFICULT BREATHING,

AND ALL THE

DISEASES OF THE PULMONARY ORGANS.

ITS ACTION IS EXPECTORANT, ALTERATIVE, SUDORIFIC, SEDATIVE, DIAPHORETIC and DIURETIC, which renders it one of the most valuable remedies known. Mr. Allen's Lung Balsam cures the lungs. It excites expectoration, and causes the lungs to throw off the phlegm or mucus, changes the secretions and PURIFIES THE BLOOD; heals the irritated parts; gives strength to the digestive system, brings the liver to its proper action, and imparts, beyond the possibility of doubt, strength to the whole system. Such is the immediate and satisfactory effect, that it is warranted to break up the most distressing cough in a few hours' time, if not of too long standing. It is warranted to give entire satisfaction even in the most confirmed cases of Consumption. It is warranted not to produce costiveness, which is the case with most remedies, or affect the head, as it contains no Opium in any form. It is warranted to be perfectly harmless to the most delicate child, although it is an active and powerful remedy for restoring the system. There is no real necessity for so many deaths by Consumption, when ALLEN'S LUNG BALSAM will prevent it, if only taken in time.

Sold by all Druggists. Price $1 per bottle.

ALAMEDA PARK HOTEL.

This new and elegant House will be opened for the reception of guests, on SATURDAY, the 18th instant. It is situated on the Alameda Encinal, within three minutes' walk of the San Leandro Railway, and three miles from the end of the wharf, between which and the foot of Broadway, steamers ply at frequent intervals during the day. The hotel can be reached by boat and rail, in forty minutes from Montgomery street. The location is in the midst of a dense grove, and, as a suburban resort, cannot be surpassed for beauty and healthfulness.

This hotel is splendidly fitted up with all the modern improvements, and in every respect will be conducted as a first class public house.

The proprietor would call especial attention of families to the attractiveness of this locality, so accessible, and yet retired, and free from the turmoil of the city.

Bowling Alleys, Billiard rooms, and all of the leading journals of the day will be at the disposal of visitors, while the sportsman can find an abundance of wild game in the vicinity of the hotel.

By a strict attention to business the proprietor hopes to merit the public patronage.

BRANDRETH'S PILLS!

THE SAFE PATH TO HEALTH!

PURIFY THE BLOOD!

The value of Brandreth's Pills, in a climate like ours is hardly to be estimated. Their prompt use every day saves valuable lives. Always keep them in the house.

In cholera and in sudden pains of all kinds they soon give relief, and the patient is restored with renewed health.

BRANDRETH'S PILLS!

For one hundred and thirteen years, have held their reputation for efficacy, mildness and absolute certainty of operation; in fact, they are admitted to be the BEST PURGATIVE by all who have used them.

THEY ARE UNRIVALLED AS A FAMILY

MEDICINE,

In Dyspepsia, Loss of Appetite, Habitual Constiveness, Rheumatic Pains in the Head, in Affections of the Kidneys, in the Diseases of Children, and for Worms, and as a General Purifier of the Blood. For Colds, Bilious Affections, Fevers and Disorders arising from Obstructed Perspiration, so common in this climate, they have not their equals among all the Medicines of the Day.

AS A PURGATIVE AND BILIOUS PILL,

They have not their equal in the world. Employed according to directions, accompanying every box of new style, they produce

Great Purity of the Blood and System Generally.

BRANDRETH'S PILLS are sold at 25 cents per box, enveloped in full directions. Purchase none unless my Private Government Stamp is on the box. See upon it "B. BRANDRETH," in white letters.

A NEW INVENTION!

LEWIS'S

Self-Acting Wagon Brake!By means of this invention, the wheels of a wagon are made to lock themselves when going down hill, certainly and effectively, and are released the moment there is any strain on the horses, without attention on the part of the driver.It is already in use in many parts of the East, and has everywhere given satisfaction.It will lock a wheel so that it CANNOT REVOLVE, the efforts of the wheel to turn making the lock tighter.It operates in an instant, locking or unlocking as necessary.

It needs no care and requires no exertion.

It cannot fail to work, and is easier on the team than the common brake.Simple in its construction, and costing no more than the common lock, it gives perfect security, and a child may drive the heaviest wagon over the steepest roads.It can be used in the same way as the common hand or foot brake: A touch on the lever will effectually lock the wheels, and

RUNAWAYS ARE IMPOSSIBLE.

"We that have free souls, it touches us not."

HAMLET—Act III., Scene 2.

ON Wednesday the continent of America reverberated with the tread of millions, as with and solemn step they marched to lay a martyr in the tomb. In San Francisco almost the entire male population participated in the funeral procession to show honor to the memory of America's Chief Magistrate. The soul of Abraham Lincoln has returned to God. While he lived he battled nobly for the right. His work was done, his mission was accomplished and he laid down his life. He is now numbered in the ranks of the noble army of martyrs. Who amongst us did not mourn the death of Abraham Lincoln? We hear of one here, another there, who rejoices over the deed of shame that has plunged a nation into mourning. Poor wretches! They know not what they do. Haug them? Pshaw! that were to disgrace honest help. The South had one staunch, honest friend, and a Southerner killed him. To whom can they now appeal for mercy? In the place of the olive branch extended them by large-hearted, generous Abraham Lincoln, the sword of justice gleams in the hand of stern, inexorable Andrew Johnson. Bitterly will the South bewail his death. They have cause. It was a grand sight, that procession on Wednesday last, where all nations, all creeds, all politics, were welded in the common feeling of grief for the death of a great and good man, and horror at the cowardly crime which took him from amongst us. We have buried Freedom's Martyr, but the spirit which animated him reigns in the hearts of millions who will perfect the work which he has left them to do. He bore all the heat and burden of the day, and has been called to receive his reward in heaven, while others reap the fruits of his labors on earth. Let us press steadily forward to the great end he had in view. Vengeance will be taken on the poor, paltry assassin; no spot on God's earth can afford him a shelter. Would that his name could then be utterly forgotten. The mere taking of his life cannot satisfy Justice for the crime he has committed. What does his life weigh against that which he destroyed? Let him be hanged like a dog, and having done that, we have done but a small part of our work. Abraham Lincoln is not to be thus avenged. Let the principles which he taught be carried out; let the same stern, uncompromising policy guide the Cabinet, and prove that Abraham Lincoln, though we have laid his body in the earth, still lives. When peace once more reigns amongst us; when slavery is utterly, eternally abolished, when the union of hearts and the union of hands is restored throughout the land; when Americans from North to South and East to West join together on the fifteenth day of April in each year to commemorate the martyrdom of Abraham Lincoln, and thank God who sent them such a man, then may we say that the great Apostle of Freedom, who, stricken to the earth by the foul monster Slavery, a weeping nation laid in an honored grave, is avenged—right nobly avenged!

The newspapers are much exercised about what will become of the negroes. We heard the great negro question very easily disposed of this week by a sensible old colored woman. She said: "I'm going right away down South, and so is every colored man and woman who came from there going down South; they all love the South." "But," we said, "how will you support yourself when you get South?" The old lady, giving her head a toss, exclaimed: "Well, I reckon it won't be very difficult to do that, as, when I was down there before, I had to support my master as well as myself, and now I've only got myself to look after." There is the negro question in a nutshell. Give them only a fair show, let them remain in their beloved sunny South, and there is not much danger of their becoming a burden on the country. If as slaves their labor was sufficient to enrich the overseer, give the owner of the plantation a fair interest on his capital invested and provide themselves with food and clothing, surely as free men they will be able and willing to provide for themselves.

We do not approve of mob law, and do not think that those who distributed type so rapidly on Saturday need be very desirous to let all the public know that they had a finger in the "pie." "Do good and distribute," says the Bible, but we doubt whether this command would justify such distribution as was effected in the offices of the Democratic Press, News Letter, et al. On the other hand it is doubtful whether there was much harm done; but there may be:

Little Fred Marriott,
Fly quickly! Tarry not,
Picking up News Letter pi!
Stay not sucking your thumb,
Lest a worst thing should come,
And a noose let a Briton hang high!

The fever which had seized the mob (which "mob" did not appear to number more than seven men and a boy) was a typhus fever. The compositors gave up their "sits" to the mob with great alacrity, being unable to stand the press. If anything were wanted, after the terrible disclosures made by the Flag, to prove that Beriah Brown is, or was, at the head of an armed band of rebels, suspicion will become a certainty, when we state that a number of "shooting sticks" were found in the office; "proofs" of dirty work were found everywhere, and it is reported that he had for some time kept a number of blacksmiths in constant employment. Immediately upon entering the office one of the mob smelt a "rat."

We walked by the office and saw the wild B'riah, Gaze mournfully on as he saw a chap shy a Whole cartload of books from the top story window, And no one was near this destruction to hinder. For cheekily daring 't express his opinion, The minions of Johnson pitched out all his minion, His poor ill-used form they did cruelly batter, And if they'd caught him he'd have soon been dead matter. They hunted about for the cruel seceder— Who no doubt if he'd stayed would have headed their leader— They swore for their acts they had very good reason, And they called proofs of leaders clear proofs of his treason. No howels had they as they gutted the office, And they swore sus. per col. they would see "the old dough-face," But he took timely warning and went out of town, Convinced if he stayed he would soon be done Brown.

"Our erring sisters" are returning home. We shall be very glad to receive each erring sister as she knocks at the door and humbly begs for admission. At the same time, these sisters must not be very much astonished if the respectable sisters of the great family of Uncle Sam turn up their virtuous noses, and gather their skirts round them at their approach. This is to be expected, but the feeling will no doubt wear off in time. At first, Massachusetts will be apt to say, as poor, hardward Virginia takes her place in the family circle: "Here's sister Virginia come back, has she? Pretty airs she's been putting on lately, and nice company she's been keeping! I think the Magdalene Hospital would be a better place for her than among respectable people." California, too, as poor, weary, repentant Arkansas comes in, may cry out: "You git! Don't come near me, you odious thing. I won't have you sitting down by my side, if you are my elder sister." Then Uncle Sam will cry out "Come girls we won't have any quarrelling here. Kiss and be friends. Your sisters are very sorry for what they have done; so we'll let bygones be bygones. I've settled the hash of the fellows that ruined their characters, so that they'll never be able to boast of it." The repentant sisters will then be very glad to go to work in the dairy and the manufactories, and try by their good behavior in the future, to make their sisters who staid at home, forget the time when they ran away with scamps who dressed them up in finery and filled their heads with silly fancies, and as soon as the money they got from home was spent, deserted them. Let them come in. Give them decent clothes to wear. Let them tear off that druggled stars and bars that they thought such a pretty pattern, and take the honest old stars and stripes, and when they are dressed decently like their respectable sisters, folks will soon forget their fauz pas and not be able to distinguish one from the other.

We are glad to notice that the resolutions passed by the various associations and municipal bodies of San Francisco, in commemoration of the assassination of Abraham Lincoln are with one solitary exception couched in grammatical language. This exception is as might naturally be expected, found in the preamble to the resolutions passed by the Board of Education:

"That the spotless fame of Abraham Lincoln will endure so long as American institutions shall exist, we verily believe and design that the youth of the country should be fully impressed with the greatness and goodness of our lamented President, and the eminence of his public services."

We would respectfully inform the Board of Education that "design" does not govern the subjunctive mood, and that they therefore design that the youth of the country shall be fully impressed, etc.

The telegraphic correspondent of the associated press makes a sad hash of his description of the obsequies of the late President: "Dr. Gurley, standing at the head of the coffin, uttered a few most impressive remarks, chiefly in the solemn words of scripture, consigning the dead ashes of the once animated soul of Abraham Lincoln, to the original dust." This is simply horrible. Reason and decency would we should have supposed have led the editors of the Alta, if, indeed, there be a man of sufficient intelligence among them to be aware of its absurdity, to change such a phrase as "consigning the dead ashes of the once animated soul of Abraham Lincoln to the original dust," into something more sensible. We will, however, venture to say, that this vile denial of the immortality of the soul, will be republished by the entire newspaper press of California, without correction or comment.

Entire freedom of speech is not allowed, even under the beneficent rule of the British Government. On the 17th of February last, at a ball given in Belfast, Ireland, in aid of a Roman Catholic charity, a young gentleman of the name of M'Erlane got drunk. He shouted, said the policeman, "to—ll with the Queen, and that he would like to see the Prince of Wales hanged by the neck like a dog, and that he (Mr. M'Erlane) would be his public executioner." He also said he was "an enemy of the Queen," "a true St. Patrick" and that "he had 30,000 men under his command, to hunt down the Protestant Queen." This patriotic Irish gentleman, for merely "expressing his opinions," was actually sent to jail to take his trial for using seditious and treasonable language. This will doubtless much shock the miners at the Allison Ranch.

The Flag says that a day or two ago, Dr. Mouser was attending a lady patient, who, in the course of conversation, expressed her satisfaction at the assassination of Abraham Lincoln, upon which the doctor arose from his seat, nud, taking the prescription he had written, deliberately tore it in pieces and informed the lady she must seek some other medical adviser. The doctor might have done better than this—he might have written her another prescription, or recommended a doctor of this city who would gladly have availed himself of the chance to prescribe for her.

The Call, speaking of Mr. James Cooke, calls him "the jester whom Shakespeare drew," enclosing these words in quotation marks. We should like the dramatic critic of the Call, to inform us from what author it is quoted. We have heard of "the Jew whom Shakespeare drew;" perhaps the critic imagines the "Jew whom Shakespeare drew," to have been a jeu d'esprit, and thinks it therefore allowable to change it into "jester."

The Bulletin gives the length of the procession on Wednesday, as at least three miles. The telegraph informs us that the length of the procession which followed the remains of President Lincoln to the grave, was three miles. We are inclined to believe that the telegraphic correspondent has made a mis-statement regarding the Washington procession, and that our contemporary has been "stretching" a little, as regards the one in this city.

In the death of Richard Cobden, America has lost a firm friend and an ardent admirer. It is doubtful whether he did not admire this country even more than he did his own.

TELEGRAPHIC message to a party whose address is unknown: Jefferson Davis, from the captain of the Shenandoah, Australia. TREM.

PARTING.

THE sun is lying in his western chamber,
The stately ships are sailing on the bay,
And cloud-larks spread n coverlet of amber,
Bordered with brown, above the drowsy day:
The opaline skies will shine the same to-morrow,
And white snails pass gilded with amber light;
But the coming shadow of a parting sorrow
Shall dim the glory of to-morrow night.

Now, in the West, the radiance grows dimmer,
The first faint star comes, shining tremulously,
And red rays from the distant lighthouse glimmer
Across the foam-capped waters of the sea;
To-morrow's dusk will bring the trembling starlight,
The wind will chase the white waves to the shore,
And fitfully again will come the far light
Of warning lamp—but thou wilt come no more.

Ever and everywhere spectres of parting
Stretch forth their weird hands, saddening our mirth;
Ever and everywhere hot tears are starting,
Where stands the empty chair upon the hearth:
But Nature brightly smiles though hearts are broken,
Taking at last her children to her breast,
And kindly hides in her mute mounds all token
Of the great heart-throbs of a life's unrest.

EMILIE LAWSON.

MY FIRST BRIEF.

IN TWO PARTS.—PART SECOND.

I HAD seen the commander of the steamboat before, but I had never spoken with him. He was a lean, wiry, undersized man, with a clever, rat-like face, much tanned by weather. He wore no nautical garb; none of those gold-laced caps, anchor-buttons and navy-blue suits, in which our British captains delight; but merely the everlasting swallow-tailed coat, black pants and satin vest, which seem as essentially a part of an American as his skin itself. The captain was tramping up and down his little den in a great state of fretfulness, biting his nails, stamping his heels on the floor, and viciously kicking a half-open locker in which his bedding lay during the daytime. The usual simile for a man thus angrily promenading an apartment is, or used to be, a caged lion; but the captain's size and features precluded a comparison with the king of beasts, and he put me more in mind of a restless lynx or an uneasy racoon.

"Shut the door, Juba," commanded the skipper; "shut the door, and take yourself off out of eavesdropping range. If I catch your black ears near my cabin door I'll nail 'em to the woodwork, spry as wild cats, I will."

Juba closed the door, and I heard his splay feet, in their ill-fitting shoes, scuffling away over the matting. The captain waited, listening, with his head on one side, for a moment or two, and then eyed me with anything but pleasure as he exclaimed—

"Well, mister, may I ask what you reckon will be the upshot o' this?"

"That, sir," said I, not without a certain austerity—"that, sir, I wait to learn from yourself."

The Yankee gave me a long and piercing stare, and then turned his face from me, and proceeded to ignite a match and kindle a cigar, just as though what I had said had been too absurd to require an answer. After a while he spoke again, in measured jerks, between the puffs of his cigar:

"Innocence is—puff—a good dog—but—puff—common sense—puff—brags it, I reckon. I've heerd—your grit was good—but the pitcher—can go too often—to the well—I some think."

"Do you want to drive me mad, sir," cried I, exasperated beyond all endurance, "that you persist in your innuendoes and dark speeches? It would become you better, as commander of this vessel, to remonstrate with your passengers respecting their inhospitable and brutal treatment of an unoffending stranger."

But here Captain Jonathan Willis interrupted me, plucking his half-consumed Havana from between his thin lips, and crushing it under his heel.

"Mighty unoffending!" exclaimed he, in his shrill tones; "and a stranger! most all-fired sertain that last, sirree!"

Then dropping his voice, and giving me a glance in which scorn and pity were blended:

"Mebbe you don't know, mister, that 'Nezer Trail, of Troytown, Missouri, sails in this bit of hollow timber?"

More mystery! Ebenezer Trail! Who, in the names of Edipus and the Sphinxes, was he? and why should his presence specially concern myself? Yet it was evident that the captain fully believed that the last statement ought to have crushed me, for he continued winking and nodding in the most expressive manner, while I gazed at him with dilated eyes and a brain more muddled than became a member of my clear-headed profession. The skipper was the first to speak.

"Most damned ugly fix you've placed me in, mister!" said he, as he resumed his promenade. "I'd have given fifty dollars out of my own pocket sooner than it should have been so, I would. The Henry Clay will suffer for it in reparation, I know she will. There hasn't been an unpleasantness aboard the barky ever since last fall, when the Lynchers took out the other chap of your sort, down Baton Rouge way."

The other chap of my sort! Delphi was limpid to this, and the Pythian intelligible in comparison.

"What did they do with him?" I gasped out.

"S'pect they hung him!" was the cool reply. "I saw what the buzzards had left of him—and buzzards won't eat broadcloth nor yet bones—hanging ou the cypress trees last trip."

A cold moisture broke out upon my forehead, and my knees knocked together, as I heard this comprehensive summary of the fate of my predecessor; although what he had done to deserve such a doom, or what fatal bond of resemblance might exist between myself and him, was more than my bewildered intellect could solve. The captain saw my agitation. A gleam of something like genuine pity passed over his hard-lined face. He peered cautiously about, lifted a warning forefinger, and in a low, chuckling whisper uttered these remarkable words:

"If you ask my advice, mister, I'll sell cheap. Here it is, free gratis for you, in one syllable—slope!"

"Slope!" I mechanically repeated.

The captain nodded. "Hist!" said he. "I hope none of those darned niggers are listening, for it might cost me a life, and I've none to spare. Never mind! my old mother was a Bible Christian, and thought pretty much as you do. Look here! Next place we stop at, to take in wood, is Venice wharf. The General Washington, upgoing boat, will be there two hours hence or so; do you slip out, and hide behind the wood-piles till we're out of sight. Never mind your traps; skin's worth more than shirts and coats. Get aboard the General Washington, tie up your face as if you'd got the toothache, and never open your mouth to speak till your feet touch the soil of Illinois. Then you'll be safe. Hush!" And the captain opened the door, and gently pushed me out of his cabin, and shut me out. I went on deck. I sat down, far from any of the passengers, and I must have passed the next half-hour in a state of something like stupefaction; and yet my weary brain worked. Either I was mad, or everybody else must surely be fit for a strait waistcoat. What could have induced the skipper to volunteer such extraordinary counsel as that of flight? Surely a pitiful desire to possess himself of my scanty baggage could not have been the motive of his curious advice. Besides, what was the original cause of the dislike of the passengers to myself? While I was still feebly busy with this dark enigma I perceived that the Henry Clay was approaching a little wharf, around which clustered a few hovels of rude log-architecture. A bell tinkled with vociferous shrillness, and a white board nailed to a tree bore in long black letters the one word "Venice." There was a huge wood-pile for the use of passing steamers, and two or three German laborers in homespun clothes were bustling among the heaps of fuel.

I remembered that this was the place at which the captain had advised me to slip away. The moment was singularly propitious for escape; the dinner-gong had, not ten minutes before, called the passengers to the principal meal of the day, and all except myself had trooped off to the grand saloon. I could not eat; I was wretched and careworn; and so it felt out that when the plank was laid between the steamer's gangway and the wharf, nobody was on deck except the pilot, the steersman, and myself. The firemen and stokers came tramping out of the engine-room to assist in embarking the fuel, but they paid no sort of attention to me, as I leaned over the light side-rail.

The wood was got on board rapidly and roughly, and already the man whose duty it was to cast off the tow-rope that secured the Henry Clay's bows to the shore was standing beside the post over which the loop passed. Still I gazed idly upon the scene, on the dark forest, the imperfect clearings, the chocolate hued earth, and the poor hovels of this namesake of the mistress of the Adriatic. Suddenly Juba the black, napkin in hand, came softly up, stepping as if he were treading among eggs, and with a face of importance whispered in my ear:

"Massa, massa, captain send Juba say, dis Venice, dis destination massa booked for."

I gave a start. Of course I had not booked for Venice, but for New Orleans. But I quickly appreciated the skipper's kindness in renewing his well-meant hint in such a manner as to provoke as little suspicion as possible. For a moment the idea of flight sprang up within me; the shore was temptingly close; the plank was within a couple of yards; two strides would place me in safety. I hesitated. I pleaded upwardly the pros and cons of the case. Some instinct urged me not to waste time, not to throw away a chance, but to fly at once, and to hide behind the wood-piles until the Henry Clay should be hull down on the low horizon. But pride and shame were up in arms to prevent so ignominious a retreat from an invisible danger. After all, I was innocent. I was an honest man, the citizen of a friendly country, travelling on a lawful errand. What had I to fear? However capricious the people of the West might be, I should take the most dignified course in remaining to brave the matter out. Besides, in my portmanteau were a dozen shirts, two of them with embroidered fronts; my best frock and dress coats, patent leather boots, slippers worked by the fair hands of—never mind whom, and other articles that I was loth to lose. Moreover—and it is wonderful how petty and great considerations link themselves together in mental debate—I should be disgraced forever in the esteem of my two military uncles, as the first poltroon whoever bore the name of Phelps. So I burked and kept down the sensible instinct of self-preservation, and let the shallow reasonings win the day.

And as I lingered, behold, it was too late. The mooring-rope was cast off, the plank was slipped inboard, the bell tinkled, and the answering splash of the paddles threw all the yellow water into foam, and the Henry Clay slipped from alongside the wharf of Venice, and glided fast down the endless river. A chance the more was added to the limbo of lost and neglected chances. Juba had left me without waiting to see the result of his message, and I sat alone, moping and upbraiding my own tardiness, during the remainder of dinner-time. For, by a not uncommon revulsion in the human mind, after having omitted to embrace the easy transition to safety and freedom while the steamer took in wood at Venice, I was actually half disposed to jump overboard and swim ashore at all hazards, before the boat was a rifleshot from the bank. But I did nothing. I stood thinking of the marvellous and unac-countable treatment which I had experienced, and wishing from the bottom of my heart that my feet were on the pavement of Fleet street once more.

The passengers came up in knots, and all gazed at me, and nudged one another, and spoke together mysteriously. The skipper came up, and gave a perceptible start as he espied me, but avoided catching my eye, and soon disappeared, whistling shrilly and beating a tattoo with his fingers on the woodwork, as he vanished into the depths below. On we went; our next stopping-place was Hopefield, in Arkansas, but it was not to be expected, with all the speed of the boat, that we should arrive there before night set in. Determined not to allow the boorishness of my fellow-travellers to annoy me, I drew out my note-book, and amused myself by jotting down in shorthand a quantity of miscellaneous information on various matters. I was thus usefully employed when my attention was attracted by a loud trampling and buzz of conversation, and lifting my head I perceived that six gentlemen were approaching with the obvious intention of addressing me.

Three of the party were known to me by name: Colonel Budge, who had charged me with the heinous offence of "tampering" with his colored servants; Captain Hiram Greenpole, the catcher of my hat, and the very author and mainspring of all the mischief; and a stately Virginian, Colonel Tarleton, by far the most gentlemanly and respectable of the Southern chivalry on board. The other three were utterly unknown to me. Colonel Tarleton seemed by common consent to have been voted chief of the party, for he it was who, stepping before the rest, removed his hat with such an air of lofty politeness, that I felt myself constrained to rise and return the salute.

"You have before you, sir, a deputation from the honorable passengers on board the Henry Clay," said the Virginian, in a tone of dignified hostility, such as would have become an ambassador presenting his sovereign's ultimatum at a foreign court.

"Well, sir?" returned I, outwardly calm, but inwardly perturbed.

"Sir," said the Virginian, "I have examined the books of this steamer, and I discover that you have entered your name as Hector Phelps, of the Inner Temple, London."

"Sir, I have," was my reply; "and I am not ashamed of it."

Here a stir, and what the newspapers call a "sensation," ensued, while some one muttered the words, "Hardened miscreant." The colonel waved his hands to entreat silence.

"I invite you, sir," said he, earnestly, "to disclose the truth. Would that you might be able to justify yourself! It would save me, sir, a most unpleasant office, and yourself from consequences which you ought to have weighed before entering on your present career."

"I must take leave to say, sir," I began, but the colonel interrupted me with—

"Hush, misguided man! you are not now in a position in which effrontery can avail you anything. The most brazen forehead, the most subtle tongue, would fail now to hoodwink those who must shortly be your judges. Denial and subterfuge will not mend matters, nor patch a rotten cause. Your only hope of mercy lies in instant confession, frank and free confession, and the denunciation of your wretched accomplices."

I stared at the incomprehensible speaker—perplexity, indignation, alarm, struggling for mastery over my mind; but never a word could I stammer out except, "Accomplices?"

"Yes, sir, accomplices!" thundered the Virginian, with a severity of eye and voice that would have roused the envy of an attorney-general; "for you cannot surely pretend to deny what is established by proofs clearer than the noonday."

"Fell the skuuk!" broke out an angry man from behind the tall colonel. The latter lifted his hand to implore silence.

"A moment, I beg!" said he; then, turning to me, "Miserable incendiary, unhappy fanatic, speak at once, and earn a milder penalty by giving up the names of those hidden villains of whom you are but the hired instrument. Speak, sir!"

Here was a predicament. Not only was I shunned, bullied, annoyed in all ways, warned to fly, baited like a bear, but I was put on my trial without a copy of the indictment, and was compelled to listen to epithets the most unwarrantable—"incendiary," "fanatic." I felt assured that such language would be actionable in all countries. Then, too, I was desired to name my accomplices, and to denounce my employers. Now I had no accomplices; and as for employers, surely Nailer and Clutchit, who had retained my services in the great case, could not be the "hidden villains" so darkly alluded to.

"If there be a law of libel in America"—I began, shaking all over with passion; but I was not suffered to proceed.

"Sir," said the Colonel, "remember that your hat—ah, you change color now! Yes, sir, your hat has been in the hands of Captain Hiram Greenpole, here present, and was by him submitted to the ocular scrutiny of four gentlemen of credit and veracity. And you owned to it, sir—you owned to it—shamelessly avowed the truth! Do you deny it now, sir?"

"Deny what?" I asked, with quivering lips, not at all certain whether to knock my tormentor down, or to fling myself overboard. But the patience of the deputation was exhausted.

"Words are wasted on so black-hearted a scoundrel!" bawled little Colonel Budge, shaking his cane at me.

"He's confessed it once, and that's enough for any Regulators' Court in the West, I kinder fancy," remarked Hiram Greenpole; while the others showered on me such flowers of speech as came uppermost; and Colonel Tarleton, stepping aside to reveal a puffy, yellow-visaged planter who stood behind him, exclaimed:

"Self-convicted criminal! behold the man whose property you have stolen, whose house you have conflagrated, whose family you have consigned to destruction! Grovel, serpent, at the feet of the injured Ebenezer Trail!"

And the Virginian, clutching me by the collar, endeavored to force me to kneel at the feet of the yellow-faced man, who rolled his jaundiced eyes tragically at me, while all the other passengers set up a roar or squeal of applause, and the ladies waved their handkerchiefs enthusiastically. Was all this a grim play, an ugly drama? Or was I not Hector Phelps, but somebody else? Had my identity been changed by one of those strokes of witchcraft of which we read in old books of diablerie? I struggled, and threw off the Virginian's grasp.

"I am a peaceable traveller," said I, gasping, "a member of the English bar, a gentleman—"

"Liar!" "Impostor!" "Double-milled, deep-red, madder-dyed villain!" cried several furious voices, and I was again roughly-collared, my hat was torn from my head, and passed along from hand to hand, every one attentively examining it, and breaking into a cry of triumph or execration at the result of the scrutiny. In vain I struggled, fought and pleaded. The majority overpowered me; my hands were tied together with two flaming silk bandanas, a red and a yellow one; my pockets were searched: my letters, purse, card-case, pocket-book, and the rest of my property were taken from me. The Virginian secured my note-book, and exultingly announced that its contents were in cipher, and that when the key should be discovered it could hardly fail to lead to important revelations. In vain I shouted forth protestations of my innocence, threats of the vengeance of Great Britain, and scraps of international law, until I was hoarse. No one listened to me. A hundred and eighty tongues wagged at once; nor from the babel of sounds could I derive any more definite idea as to my position than that I was a very hardened rogue indeed, and that I was likely to die impenitent.

Nor were all the members of the company disposed to endure the law's delays; for some rough men of Arkansas and Missouri proposed to inflict Tarleton and the more respectable passengers could accomplish to prevent my being severely handled.

"Patience, gentlemen, patience!" I heard the Colonel cry; "the majesty of the law shall be vindicated. Wait, only wait, till we can hand him over, at Hopefield, to those who will cut short his career of crime."

I heard all this, but sullen despair had come over me, and I no longer pleaded for the hearing which was so obstinately denied me. I sat on a bench to which I had been hustled rather than led, and awaited the pleasure of my captors with something of the stupid meekness which bewildered faculties produce. Evening, the short twilight of that southern latitude, was falling fast; the mist rose white above the tawny river, and the cries of wild animals resounded from the forest. The night came on, darkly clear; the stars gorgeously overhead in the moonless sky; the fire-beetles glowed among the bushes on the bank; I heard the deer belling, and the long howl of the wolf, and the whooping of the goatsucker. And then the gong beat out the noisy summons to another meal, and I sat on the deserted deck, but not now alone. A man, armed with a rifle, stood sentry in the gangway—sentry over me. He stood, pensively whistling, with his back turned, looking at the black outlines of the ghostly forest, and going through tune after tune. Mechanically my weary mind began to follow his sibilant melody, and I listened as "Nancy Dawson," changed to "Lucy Neal," and as "Riding on a Rail," melted imperceptibly into "Yankee Doodle," when a quick tread cut the musician short in the middle of a bar.

"Git along, Sam, and ask the barkeeper for a brandy cocktail. He can score it to my total. I'll take guard awhile," said the new comer, and the sentry went willingly off, resigning his gun and post to the volunteer.

"Be back in a pig's whisper, Sam!" was the parting injunction of the new-comer, in whom I now recognized the captain of the steamer.

"Well, mister," said Captain Willis, in cautious tones. "didn't I tell 'ee, and war'n't I a true prophet? Now you're regularly treed, and no mistake."

I tried to clear my brains. "Captain Willis," said I, "I do solemnly assure you that I must be mistaken for somebody else. My name is, as my letters, which have been scandalously taken from me, must prove, Hector Phelps."

"Whew!" whistled the skipper, scornfully; "what's the use of sticking to a stale trick? All's blown, man."

"And," pursued I, "I am quite innocent of every and any offence against the laws of the United States."

"Cut that palaver short, mister," said Willis; "'taint the first time, by chalks, that I've heerd chaps say that, but they never got believed so far south-west, I caution you. Now listen, for I see Hopefield lights yonder in the clearing, and Sam'll be up in a minute to take his gun again, and so open your ears as you love your neck. You're a sad scamp—you needn't snort so indignant; but I don't like to see a man strung up like a mangy cur, let alone burning alive, which ain't improbable nuther, seeing what you did at Rosehill plantation."

"What I did at Rosehill plantation!—I, Hector Phelps!"

"Look here," pursued the skipper; "all depends on what sort of a chap the sheriff may be in Hopefield there. It'll be touch and go work with you once the boys hear you're caught. If the sheriff's a man respected, a man to whip wild cats afore breakfast, you'll have a chance to get off with imprisonment until the States Marshal can smuggle you out to Illinois or Iowa. If sheriff's muf, you'll never see the inside of the jail, you wou't. Keep quiet; don't deny anything; don't aggravate the boys by mock innocence, or you'll rile 'em past moderation. Now I've warned you."

And before I could expostulate, up came Sam, and resumed his gun and guard, the skipper slipping away and leaving me to my fate. What was I to do?—what to expect? There, right ahead, gleamed the few lights of the little town where, as it seemed, my destiny was soon to be decided. The clash of steel and glass ended, and the passengers once more crowded the deck. In a few minutes the Henry Clay approached the quay of Hopefield, and I could see a dark mass of human forms, agitated to and fro by some common impulse, and uttering at intervals a low hoarse roar, that had a distressing resemblance to those uttered by wild beasts in a menagerie when feeding-time approaches.

I was perplexed to account for these signs of popular commotion, when the yellow Ebenezer Trail, of Troytown, Missouri approached me, and, with a most malignant scowl, tapped me on the shoulder, and pointed to the bows of the steamer, where burned five lamps, three green and two red, arranged as a pyramid:

"Which means," said, or rather hissed, the wronged Ebenezer, "that we've caught a snake more venomous than any rattler or copperhead on the pararies; and hark! the boys are getting ready to welcome you as you deserve."

A long, loud yell, that Pawnee warriors might have envied, so savagely exultant was the ring of it, came on the breeze, and then the red smoky glare of pine knots and resinous torches, and of a flaming tar barrel, threw a glow of lurid crimson over the dusky forms whose tossing arms and wild gesture gave them the air of demons toiling in their congenial element. I confess that my heart sank as the steamer was steered inshore, and when I heard the splash of the mooring ropes, and the grating of the plank that was thrust towards the wharf, I felt much as if I were on the scaffold, and resigning myself to the last attentions of the eminent Mr. Calcraft. The mob roared and leaped, and the passengers of the Henry Clay huzzared responsively. Obviously my capture was regarded as a victory.

"Hurrah! hurrah! we've got him, the dratted thief! hurrah! 'Biram's treed! 'Biram's treed! Chuck him over to us, misters!" Such were the cries of the crowd. "'Biram—Abiram!" again the recollection crossed me that I had been addressed by this name by the black steward. No doubt I was mistaken for another.

"Gentlemen," I cried, in despairing accents, "hear me. I am not the person you name. I am not Abiram."

"Yah! whoop! lying hound! We've got you, old 'possum! Yah! whoop!" yelled the populace.

The plank touched the quay. Colonel Tarleton grasped my left arm, Hiram Greenpole enclosed my right in his vice-like clutch, while two other persecutors impelled me from behind.

"Hurrah! huzza!" bawled the crowd, as, bare-headed and bound, I was pushed upon the plank, at the other end of which a confused medley of flaring torches, clenched fists, and angry faces awaited me. In the gangway stood Captain Willis, the wiry skipper.

"Gentlemen," screamed he, in the highest key of his shrill voice, "I bring you a queer bird for your cage yonder by Soapstone Creek. Off to jail with him! Where's the sheriff?"

"Here am I!" answered a deep voice; and a stout, resolute-looking man, in a farmer's garb of "hutternut" colored homespun, elbowed his way to the plank.

"A prisoner for you, sir, charged with arson, conspiracy, and other offences. Collar him well, I advise," cried Colonel Tarleton.

"I'm ready," said the sheriff; "give me a grip of him. Stand back, boys. Marshal, stand by me; and you, mister, you, constable there, bear a hand!"

"No, no," hawled the mob; "no law but Judge Lynch's law. Hang him up to the next tree—drown him—burn him, as he and his black devils burned white women and children—into the fire with old 'Biram—skin him—scalp him—huzza!"

"Gentlemen," roared Colonel Tarleton, "don't break the law. All worthy citizens, help me to give up this man to the custody of the legal authorities. Sheriff, in the name of the United States and the State of Arkansas, do your duty!"

There was a regular fight, compared with which an election riot is child's play. I was hustled, beaten, bruised, trampled, overthrown, trodden to a jelly, dragged up again, fought for, tugged at, mercilessly pounded and pummelled. A great game of "pull devil, pull baker," took place at my expense; but at last, the sheriff being resolute, and Colonel Tarleton a really humane man in his way, the law triumphed, and I found myself, bruised, bloody and with torn clothes, the inmate of a rude log-house, called by courtesy a prison. I never thought that I could have been so glad to see the inside of a jail; but we live and learn. My summary execution had only been delayed on the assurance of the sheriff that he would consent to my speedy trial, not before a regular court, but before the extra-legal tribunal of the "Regulators." The proposal to send me to Little Rock for examination before the State Court met with an indignant rejection, and I was told that on the morrow I must plead before the rough and ready jury of the "Regulators."

But on the morrow I was delirious, and tossing to and fro on my maize straw bed, in the throes of a dangerous fever. Ill usage, heat, anxiety and the unhealthy climate had combined to bring on this disorder, so common in Missouri and Arkansas. I was kindly nursed by some free persons of color, who had the courage to brave the popular odium in their charitable wish to comfort the desolate stranger. From my heart I thank them. But for them I should have died in that wretched place. Long I lay between life and death, burning hot and deadly chill alternately, and raving of Whittle v. Wotherspoon, of Ebenezer Trail, and of the great cause I was to plead before the Regulators against Abiram, at the suit of Nailor and Clutchit. But before that court I never appeared. When I was strong enough to converse, the doctor kindly told me that I was a free man.

A letter had arrived from the real Simon Pure, the true Abiram Peters, the famous abolitionist emissary, for whom I had been unhappily mistaken. This Peters, a fanatical but crafty enthusiast, was obnoxious as having excited the negroes on many plantations to revolt, as having spirited away numberless slaves to Canada, and having been, in fact, a fire-brand through the South. This Abiram had been the old passenger in wig and spectacles who had attracted my notice during his short trip in the Henry Clay. Carrying, as he did, his life in his hand, he had assumed the aspect and bearing of old age and infirmity to prevent recognition, and was himself not aware that within the hat he wore, under the lining, was written in full his detested name, Abiram Peters, the publication of which would, in the South, have been his death-warrant. This hat, which closely resembled mine, I had most unluckily mistaken for my own in the hurry of quitting the cabin, Peters having by a similar blunder, appropriated my hat when he lauded at Shawneetown.

When my hat was blown off, and was caught by Hiram Greenpole, the lining was disturbed, and the name was described. Hence arose the whole mistake. No definite charge being made, I was unable to justify myself, while all on board the Henry Clay firmly, and not unnaturally, believed me to be Abiram Peters in person. My fever probably saved me from the halter; and the real Abiram, seeing in the journals a full account of his own capture, and guessing how I had got into the scrape, wrote a letter from Pennsylvania that fully exonerated me. It was then discovered that Ebenezer Trail had never set eyes on the man to whom he charged the burning and massacre; that no person in Hopefield knew Peters by sight; and that in feature and complexion the abolition agent was wholly unlike me. Of course I was set free; nay, I was loaded with apologies and fair words, and my property was restored to me.

But already had October begun, and until the 15th I was too weak to travel. I crossed the Atlantic by the next steamer, took the mail train from Liverpool to London, and, after a few hours repose, rushed to Westminster, put on my wig and gown, and hurried into court, to find—what? to find the great case of Whittle v. Wotherspoon drawing to a close, shamefully mismanaged by that idiot Prattles, of Pump Court, who filled my vacant place. The Chief Justice ruled dead against us; the jury followed his lordship's lead; the wretched Wotherspoon triumphed; and the faces of Nailor and Clutchit, as they shook their heads reproachfully at me, smote me to the heart. Shall I ever get another brief? At any rate, I shall never forget the manner in which I lost my first.—St. James' Magazine.

TRYING TO SETTLE IT.—A Scotch minister, in visiting some members of his flock, came to the door of a house where his gentle tapping could not be heard for the noise of contention within. After waiting a little he opened the door and walked in, saying in an authoritative voice, "I should like to know who is the head of this house?" "Weel, sir," said the husband and father, "if ye sit doon a wee we may be able to tell ye, for we're just trying to settle that point."

ATLANTIC GOSSIP.

[CORRESPONDENCE OF THE CALIFORNIAN.]

NEW YORK, March 2nd, 1865.

THE stormy March has come at last, and we are thinking about huying spring overcoats. Gold is down, but cloth iso't, and the reluctant Southerners will greatly oblige us by "caving" as soon as they can with dignity. Now, why in the demnition bow-wows shall they persist for a free edifice of sable sorrow, in depriving us of the many little gimcracks which make civilization tolerable? [Our correspondent has been gratified with a more speedy compliance than perhaps could have been expected at the date of his letter. The "caving" has commenced in a way that promises to bury the "free edifice" very effectually; and the recent assassination of the President has clinched the nails in the coffin of the "Southern Confederacy."—EDS. CALIFORNIAN.]

The searching investigations which the Government agent, Lafayette C. Baker, has made into the alleged malpractice of bounty officers and substitute brokers, has made, of course, its quantum of excitement. Baker is probably the most accomplished detective in the country—a perfect Jonathan Wild, actor as well as magistrate—and his career during the existing war has been as wild and varied as that of Robert Houdin or Sergeant Champe. His power of characterization and costume is wonderful. Among the late investigations he personated in one day a soldier, an officer of the navy, a country Supervisor, and a Jack Tar. Some of his disclosures were ludicrous, others melodramatic. One of the arrested bounty brokers, who cannot write his own name, is worth $200,000 in real estate; another, who eighteen months ago slept in the gutters or under the tiles, has $45,000 on deposit at the Broadway Bank. The probabilities are strong that justice will be meted out to them without stint.

Among the precious schemes of the time is one to take the control of its fire organization from the city and make its management a perquisite of the State. So, one after one, the charters which make a great corporation are sundered from it, and few vestiges of municipal liberty are left.

Some copies of Sala's new book have come to hand, sent by him to his admirers on this side of the water. It is sketchy and contradictory, its paragraphs vivid but not correct, and underneath all lies his sinister or reckless lack of principle. Yet it is strange to see how one or two good men, far removed above him as Elijah from any peeco-a-liner who reported his going up, affected even this mercenary hack, the most unscrupulous of working journalists in our tongue. He visited the pure and good Longfellow, whom all of us love, and says this of him:

"He gave me a cigar, and he smoked one likewise. Some one in England had just sent him an album full of photographs of English men of letters, and I was proud to see that mine was among the number, and he recognized me by it; prouder than though I had been bidden to stand before a king. I rose at last, loth to depart, and left him there, sorrowful but not desolate. I presume I shall never see him again, but I shall never forget that I have been permitted to touch his hand and to listen to the discourse, full of calm and wise and gentle things, of a noble American man—of him who wrote the 'Village Blacksmith,' and 'Evangeline'—of him whose life has been blameless, whose record is pure, whose name is a sound of fame to all people—Henry Wadsworth Longfellow."

I honor Sala no more than before, but his adulation affirms what I have always held of the truest, purest and highest of our poets.

A. Malespine, the foreign editor of the Opinion Nationale, is perhaps the truest friend of America in the French metropolis. He has visited this country and admires it greatly; besides, he manages to attach himself to the United States diplomats and was intimate with the late minister Dayton. The Opinion Nationale circulates about nine thousand copies, and is radically republican; the Siecle circulates forty-odd thousand and the Presse four thousand; the Moniteur, (morning edition) ten thousand; the Monde, twenty-five thousand, the Petit Journal, one hundred thousand copies. The latter publishes no foreign news and so escapes the stamp duty. Most of the Parisian journalists are legislators as well; the cleverest of them, and most indefatigable is Emile de Girardin. Malespine, mentioned above, has published three brochures in favor of the Union in its effort to put down the present unholy and causeless rebellion. In our hour of triumph, we must not forget the few friends we had in France during the darker days.

Olive Logan's book, Chateau Frissac, is praised and quoted at large. She is both authoress and actress, having written a play as well, which, in current puffery, is asserted to have been read and commended by the Empress, but I have seen so much of the reality of the alleged American reputations abroad that I am skeptical even upon this point. And after all, what has the Empress' opinion to do with the literary value of any book? I would much sooner depend upon yours or my own. Must dramatic people always be toadies and parasites, even when they get out of the theatre?

You should see the theatres in which many trans-Atlantic "reputations" are made, to be afterward advertized in extenso here—wretched Hebrew and costermonger temples on Bishopsgate street or Hackney road, where a lady goes at her peril, and a gentleman to his disgust. The longer I live the more am I disappointed with every thing histrionic. Here is Gaylor, dramatic author par excellence, yet his life is a hodge-podge, now getting off a burlesque, now a medley for some negro minstrel's motley corps, now a drama upon oil or stock-jobbing, now stealing the thunder of some foreign play-wright, and eking out a few dollars under cover of some imported and successful play. Personally, Gaylor is jolly enough, and he has the stature of a giant.

Wallack's is the theatre, par excellence, of New York, but what a degenerate representativeism do we find there! Its leading lady, Miss Henriques, is a pretty little face, without power or versatility, and her popularity must be ascribed only to the fineness of her wardrobe; John Gilbert is the best of the heap, but he is not a student; old Norton, to the dishonor of his profession, keeps a liquor bar opposite the theatre; Mark Smith has enough talent but no industry; the rest are only serviceable, like mortar, in a house; and yet this play-house place is at the head of our dramatic art.

The more I think over the literature and the art of the war just closing in triumph to our arms, the more am I disgusted that during this struggle, which, upon one side or the other, has enlisted all the passions, and should have evoked the highest inspiration, the most nervous prosody, the most exhaustless argument and illustration, we have had no literature at all, or such as is fit for children merely. Possibly some General, more devoted to letters than the mass, may have made careful notes and analyses of his particular campaigns, but I have heard of none. There has been no Xenophon to record his disasters, no Cæsar to describe his triumphs, no Livy to cast together these mighty materials, so that they shall make an everlasting monument. We have had as good "fighting generals" as the world ever produced, but they have not shown us that they are equally happy with the pen. A parcel of ragged and illiterate boys are hanging after the army, to send home superficial and deplorable stories of what they neither see nor comprehend; but as yet the war has produced no literary genius. I was once a correspondent, as I have already told you, and I never read a military book of any kind. Yet, forsooth, I sat in judgment upon Generals.

Recently I strolled into the Astor Library to spend a leisure hour over Cæsar. I cannot tell you in this "Desultory" letter how I was thrilled and charmed by his concise and profound genius. There was a preface to the translation, describing the Roman art of war, the organization of their armies, their method of marching, encampment, siege and assault. Never before had I lamented the sluggishness of my school days. It is a pity that one goes to school so young. Amid the motley people who haunt that fine Bibliotheque to dissipate and sleep, I sat over old Cæsar as a girl sits over a romance. After all, the best education for peace is that of war! Give men strong, martial bodies, quick faculties, concentration, and a love of country and glory—these being the components of a soldier—and we shall also have good scholars, staunch, public-spirited citizens, and enough love of art and letters to inspire taste without encouraging enervation.

I would like to have something to praise, but can't find it. The artists have a reception shortly, and perhaps, if I attend it, I may see or hear something to puff. Till then, I stop this waudering budget of

Yours truly, DESULTORY.

"JENKINS" AT THE RECEPTION.

ONE of the editors of the Cincinnati Commercial thinks that "Jenkins" ought to describe the dress of the gentlemen, as well as that of the ladies, who attend great balls and parties. He tries his hand as follows on the gentlemen who were present at a late reception in Washington:

Mr. J—n Sm—h (I must adopt the regular Jenkins style of initials only) wore a coat and a pair of pantaloons that would do honor to any tailor's shop. The latter were a little too long, and it was the general impression that the charming wearer would have looked much better had he rolled them up a little.

Mr. J—n—s had a hat of exquisite material. The block was imported for him specially. He also, like Mr. S—h, wore a coat and pantaloons. The former was of beautiful texture, and had pockets behind.

Mr. J—n—son was attired very fashionably in black broad-cloth—coat and pants, together with a vest which had two pockets and a convenient place for a watch.

Mr. R—h—son wore a shirt of beautiful material, handsomely plaited in the bosom, and embroidered all round. It had just been ironed, and imparted to the wearer a very unique appearance.

Mr. B— was remarked for the excellent pair of shoes he had on. They had just been half-soled, and made delightful music.

Mr. F— was splendidly attired, but the article which attracted most attention was his pocket-handkerchief, which was hemmed in a remarkable manner. A slight cold in the head caused him to use it frequently.

Mr. H— was the cynosure of all eyes, on account of the beautiful and costly buttons on his pantaloons, which differed from all others in being "flaps."

Mr. S— wore a magnificent undershirt of steel gray, with his name on the corner in indelible ink.

Mr. T— displayed a beautiful pair of whiskers, which must have cost an immense sum. They were universally admired.

Mr. S— wore a ring on his little finger, and the cuffs of his shirt were charmingly held in the embrace of mother-of-pearl.

Mr. W— added, to a new costly apparel, a pair of stockings that attracted much attention. They were upheld by India rubber garters of the finest finish.

Mr. R—, (the enterprising tallow-chandler,) was much admired for the suavity of his manner and the buttons of his vest.

Mr. C—, (in the petroleum business,) was beautifully perfumed with a new article of bears' grease. He smelled very sweet.

Mr. Blank, (in the dry goods line,) wore a cravat which was tied with much taste, and a standing-collar which fitted his finely formed neck with great tightness.

Mr. I—, (the celebrated spruce beer dealer,) was the observed of all observers, on account of his boots, which were the finest calf-skin, and were said to be genuine rights and lefts.

Mr. K—, (in the orange and peanut way,) wore a costly pair of woolen mittens, knit expressly for the occasion.

Mr. M— took the palm for mustaches. They were in a high state of waxation.

Mr. L— made a very graceful appearance in plaids. What was chiefly remarkable about him was the beautiful color of his shirt, which was of the finest brown muslin.

Mr. N—'s finely moulded form was set off to great advantage by a pair of suspenders of the finest texture, and a beautifully starched "dickey."

Mr. V— was splendidly attired. In addition to a coat and vest, he wore a pair of pantaloons which were buttoned with neatness and precision.

THE DEATH OF HARRISON.

WHAT! soar'd the old eagle to die at the sun!

Lies he stiff with spread wings at the goal he had won!
Are there spirits more blest than the "Planet of Even,"
Who mount to their zenith, then melt into Heaven—
No waning of fire, no quenching of ray,
But rising, still rising, when passing away?
Farewell, gallant eagle! thou'rt buried in light!
God speed into Heaven, lost star of our night!

Death! Death in the White House! Ah, never before,
Tro'd his skeleton foot on the President's floor!
He is looked for in hovel, and dreaded in hall—
The king in his closet keeps hatchment and pall—
The youth in his birthplace, the old man at home,
Make clean from the door-stone the path to the tomb;
But the lord of this mansion was cradled not here—
In a churchyard far-off stands his beckoning bier!
He is here as the wave-crest heaves flashing on high—
As the arrow is stopp'd by its prize in the sky—
The arrow to earth, and the foam to the shore—
Death finds them when swiftness and sparkle are o'er—
But Harrison's death fills the climax of story—
He went with his old stride—from glory to glory!

Lay his sword on his breast! There's no spot on its blade
In whose cankering breath his bright laurels will fade!
'Twas the first to lead on at humanity's eul—
It was stay'd with sweet mercy when "glory" was all!
As calm in the council as gallant in war,
He fought for his country, and not its "hurrah!"
In the path of the hero with pity he trod—
Let him pass—with his sword—to the presence of God!

What more? Shall we on with his ashes? Yet, stay!
He hath ruled the wide realm of a king in his day!
At his word, like a monarch's, went treasure and land—
The bright gold of thousands has pass'd through his hand.
Is there nothing to show of his glittering hoard?
No jewel to deck the rude hilt of his sword—
No trappings—no horses?—what had he, but now?
On!—on with his ashes!—HE LEFT BUT HIS PLOUGH!

Follow now, as ye list! The first mourner to-day
Is the nation—whose father is taken away!
Wife, children and neighbor may mourn on his knell—
He was "lover and friend" to his country, as well!
For the stars on our banner, grown suddenly dim,
Let us weep, in our darkness—but weep not for him!
Not for him—who, departing, leaves millions in tears!
Not for him—who has died full of honor and years!
Not for him—who descended Faue's ladder so high
From the round at the top he has stepp'd to the sky!

AN, vanitas, vanitatum! Which of us is happy in this world? Which of us has his desire; or, having it, is satisfied?—Thackeray.

THE fate of many a person is, up to a certain point, a tangle which must be unravelled by friendly hands if it is not to be tightened into an irretrievable knot.

ASSASSINATION OF PRESIDENT LINCOLN.

WE compile the facts connected with the recent National bereavement, presenting to our readers a careful collation, worthy to be preserved as a reliable record. Much of our space, this week, is devoted to the engrossing topic; we feel that pending the visitation of the great grief which sits heavily upon the heart of every true patriot, minor topics become comparatively insignificant:

On the evening of April 14th, (Good Friday,) the President, accompanied by Mrs. Lincoln, a Miss Harris and Major Rathburn, went to Ford's theatre, Washington, to witness the performance of The American Cousin. At about 10 o'clock, a man came into the private box, and, rushing past Major Rathburn, who was standing near the door, placed a pistol close to Mr. Lincoln's head and fired. Instantly springing upon the cushioned balustrade of the box, he drew a knife, made a backward plunge at the President, and jumping to the stage, exclaiming "Sic semper tyrannis," he disappeared before the audience could recover from their bewilderment. Escaping through a side door, he mounted a horse and fled. On examination it was found that the President had been shot through the head, above and back of the temporal bone; and that some of the brain was oozing out.

Miss Harris, who was in the box with the President, makes the following statement of the daring and terrible assassination: Nearly an hour before the commission of the deed, the assassin came to the door of the box, looked in, and took a survey of the position of its occupants. It was supposed at the time that it was either a mistake, or an exercise of impertinent curiosity. The circumstance attracted no particular attention at the time. Upon his entering the box again, Major Rathburn rose and asked the intruder his business. The latter rushed past the Major without making any reply, placed his pistol close to the back of the President's head, actually in contact with it and fired. Major Rathburn sprang forward and received the stab in his arm. The murderer then jumped on the stage and effected his escape. The rapidity with which the attack was committed upon the President was astounding. Mrs. Lincoln saw the form of the assassin go down from the box, and thought Mr. Lincoln had fallen out. She looked to see if she could see him on the floor, and barely saw the culprit jump to the stage, when, alas, as she turned her eyes to the box, she saw Mr. Lincoln's head had dropped forward upon his breast, and at once realized what had transpired.

From the moment the President was shot, up to his death he was insensible, exhibited no signs of pain, and recognized no one. In fact, it was believed he did not open his eyes. The blood troubled his breathing, often making it exceedingly difficult. He lingered until the next morning, Saturday, when at 22 minutes past 7 o'clock he expired.

The wretch who committed this most diabolical of all dark deeds, and deprived the nation of its honored and beloved head, is James Wilkes Booth, son of the famous actor of that name, and brother of Edwin and J. B. Booth, who once resided in San Francisco.

About the same hour that the President was murdered, an assassin entered Secretary Seward's apartments and under pretense of having a prescription, was shown to the Secretary's chamber. The assassin immediately rushed to the bedside and inflicted two or three stabs in the throat and two in the face. The assassin after wounding Mr. Fred. Seward, Major Seward and Mr. Hansell on the stairway, went to the chamber where lay the sick Secretary. As Robinson the nurse, opened the door to learn the cause of the disturbance outside, a man struck at his breast. In his hand he had a long knife-blade, which appeared to be about a foot in length, and an inch wide. Robinson determined to oppose his progress, and raised his arm to parry the blow; the consequence was that a wound was inflicted in the centre of his forehead, close to the hair. The knife glanced, and he clenched the hand in which the man held the dagger, which came down upon Robinson's face, and felled him to the floor. Miss Seward, at this juncture, escaped from the room, and ran to the front window, screaming "Murder!" The assassin rushed to the bed where Mr. Seward lay apparently in a helpless condition, and gave a tremendous blow at his face. He missed his mark, however, and almost fell across Mr. Seward's body. By this time Robinson recovered and jumped on the bed and caught hold of the assassin's arms. While he was thus attempting to hold the assassin, the latter struck Mr. Seward on the left side and then on the right side. The assassin then raised up, and he and Robinson came to the floor together. They both got on their feet, Robinson still keeping firm hold of him, when the assassin reached his left arm over Robinson's shoulder and endeavored to force him to the floor. Finding he could not handle Robinson in that attitude, he dropped his position, and with the hand which was around his neck caught hold of Robinson's right arm, and struck behind Robinson with the knife. Robinson forced him towards the door, which was open, with the intention of throwing him over the banisters. Major Seward who was entering the room, immediately clutched the assassin, and the latter then struck Robinson in the stomach, knocking him down. He then broke away from Major Seward and rushed down the stairs. Mr. Seward's wounds are not mortal, and, up to the present, the most favorable symptoms have presented themselves. No arteries were cut.

The would-be murderer of Secretary Seward is supposed to be a man named Survall, who is now under arrest, and will, no doubt, with his wicked accomplices, suffer a terrible penalty for their dark and damnable crimes.

The funeral obsequies of the President in Washington were of the most solemn and impressive character. The annals of civilization furnish no parallel to the fealty with which the memory of the illustrious dead was honored. It is estimated that one hundred and twenty-five thousand persons were in the streets participating in the ceremonies. The foreign ministers, with attaches, in all fifty-six, were present. Their places in the programme came immediately after the President and Cabinet. This, for the first time in our history, was in accordance with the usage of foreign nations, where the diplomatic corps follows the monarch. Heretofore, they have been placed in the programme after the ex-President, and Justices of the Supreme Court.

Upon the arrival of the head of the procession at the East front of the Capitol, the coffin was borne to the centre rotunda. President Johnson stood at the foot of the coffin, surrounded by a throng of Senators, high military officers, and a small number of Illinoisians as chief mourners. Dr. Gurley, standing at the head of the coffin, uttered a few most impressive remarks, chiefly in the solemn words of scripture, consigning the dead ashes of the once animated body of Abraham Lincoln to the original dust. The deep tones of his voice reverberated from the vast walls and ceiling of the rotunda, now first used for such a solemn occasion. During the impressive scene many were affected to tears. The remains were placed in the rotunda, and were to be conveyed thence, under escort, to Springfield, Illinois, via Philadelphia, New York, Buffalo and Chicago.

In all parts of the British provinces there was a general suspension of business, and every manifestation of deep sympathy with the people of the United States, and respect for the character of the deceased, were expressed.

A National Monument Fund is on foot, and a plot of ground six acres in extent, in the heart of the city of Springfield, Ill., has already been selected as the burial-place of Freedom's Martyr.

THE people of this city were slow to believe the terrible news which came to them on Saturday last from Washington; but when it was confirmed by despatches giving in detail the incidents of the monstrous deed which had been perpetrated, there was scarcely a loyal heart in San Francisco but beat as heavily as though the bereavement were of a personal nature. The entire city put on the habiliments of woe; and the sad, serious expression which met one everywhere, gave evidence that not alone was the loss of the Chief Magistrate deplored, but that the man beloved more than any other for qualities which take a warm, firm hold upon the affections, was lost to his kindred—the nation—forever. In some instances the intensity of grief found vent in outbursts of passion too sudden and formidable to be repressed by considerations of law or prudence. The reflection that certain persons and presses had constantly reviled and abused the nation's best earthly friend during his years of anxious toil and unselfish devotion—while employing every talent, all the means his judgment could suggest, to bring our country honorably through her difficulties—came with bitter poignancy now that that friend had fallen by the assassin's hand. The offices of the Democratic Press, News-Letter, Monitor, Occidental and Franco-American were visited and their contents thrown into the streets. The military, in the meantime, were called out, and, with the police, soon restored order to the city. On Sunday, in all the churches, allusion was made to the calamity that had befallen the nation, and fervent prayers ascended for wisdom and prudence in this hour of trial and responsibility. Funeral obsequies were celebrated on Wednesday—the day upon which the body of the President was committed to the tomb. Never before was so large a procession formed in this city, comprising all the organized bodies, military and civil, and a vast concourse of citizens. Not the least significant feature noticed was the attendance, on foot, of Archbishop Allemany and many other clergymen. The funeral car was similar to that used upon the occasion of Col. Baker's burial. At the Pavilion the exercises consisted of an oration by Rev. Horatio Stebbins, the reading of the late President's second Inaugural, singing the Battle Hymn of the Republic, and benediction by Rev. Dr. Peck. The entire proceedings of the day exhibited a unanimity in honoring the memory of the late President, a decorum and solemnity creditable to the city and worthy the sad occasion.

THE OBSEQUIES IN THE INTERIOR.

Sacramento.—In the morning services were held in all the churches. In the afternoon a large concourse of people gathered at the pavilion, adopted resolutions and listened to an address by the Rev. M. C. Briggs. The bells were tolled and guns fired during the day.

Marysville.—The day was generally observed there. A procession paraded the principal streets, and a very touching and patriotic address was delivered by the Rev. J. H. Wythe of San Francisco.

Benicia.—The funeral obsequies of the late President were observed at this place with great solemnity. The programme included a procession, the largest ever seen in the county, church services, and a eulogy delivered by Hon. M. S. Chase, of Martinez.

Petaluma.—All business places were closed during the day, and a large procession, consisting of the militia, fire department and all the societies, with a large number of citizens, marched through the principal streets to the Plaza, where appropriate services were held. Cannon were fired every half hour during the day.

In all the smaller towns of the State the day was observed as one of mourning and prayer. Business was everywhere suspended, and religious services held.

MODERN CHIVALRY.

WE have waited long, and he has come at last—the bright, consummate flower of Southern Chivalry. Great, valorous and true, as every knight should be. He has come to us perfectly graduated in the school of Southern thought, without an imperfection in his complete audacity. John Wilkes Booth! Let his name be blazoned high on the roll of modern chivalry—highest of all men that ever will be, for the judgment of the true standard makes him matchless and perfect in the sum of his villainies. Yes, he was great, for, worshipping the divinity of men who earn their bread by the sweat of other men's faces, it was his greatest deed to strike down the representative and head of the greatest nation of to-day, whose life is freedom, whose constant watchword is freedom, and whose noblest end and aim is freedom to every soul created in the Divine image. Valorous he was, as he had been taught by the selfish and degrading passions of his nature, when, overcome in principles, he would seek reparation in the demonstration of personal rage. His valor dares not meet the soldier in the field, but comes in fiendish stealth into the unarmed presence; sends death to a peaceful breast; with gleaming dagger, after the deed, struts before the footlights; accomplishes the dramatic, meaningless utterance, then runs like a cur into the darkness for his escape. He was a perfect student in chivalric morals, and everywhere gives evidence of how true he is to the instincts of the modern knight.

What for thirty years the teachers have been teaching is consummated in this villain, who has gained an immortality in degradation. Treason, then blood, the perfect accomplishment of all barbaric modes of warfare, the halter, massacre and starvation for defenceless prisoners; and, when the direful wrong which would be accomplished is overcome by honorable warfare, its rankling hate and groveling, unreasoning passion foams at the mouth, and, dying, appoints itself for burial with the blood of assassination. How the infernal depths echo and reverberate with the laughter of sympathizing friends! Of the harvests of souls that come to them every century, there's none so rare as this. How the devils clap their hands in merriest laughter, not for the death, but in the hopes that life will keep a soul so rich in villainy! For his groaning, all the years to come, "Greater, greater than I can bear," will be the sweetest music that the fiends ever danced to. And for the deed accomplished, there is sweet companionship in the essay that failed but still approached the fair consummation of Southern chivalry, whose glory is never half-known upon the battle-field, but gives sweet music when its footsteps trip up the stairs of the mansion of peace and enter the ante-chambers of Death for Death's great gain.

The civilization of to-day shudders at the view of such barbaric deeds, but it does not tremble. Above the sickening ignorance, above the intemperance of passion, above the selfish inequality of souls, it can see the day of unclouded skies. Upward, upward its eyes are cast, and reaching to the Divine hand, it chants, in greater faith, the universal chorus: "Peace, peace on earth, good will to men."

HUSBAND AND WIFE.—Preserve the privacies of your house, your marriage state and your heart from your father mother, brother, sister and all the world. Between you two, let no third person come to share the secret joy or grief that belongs to yourselves alone. Do you two, with God's help, build your own quiet world—not allowing your dearest earthly friend to be the confident of aught that concerns your domestic peace. Let moments of alienation, if they occur, be healed and forgotten in after moments and devoted love; but never let the wall of another's confidence be built up between your wife's or husband's heart. Promise this to yourselves and to each other. Review the vow at every temptation; you will find your account in it; your souls will, as it were, grow together, and at last become as one. Ah, if many a young pair had known this all-important secret, how many marriages would have been happier than, alas! they are.

THY WILL BE DONE.

WE see not, know not; all our way
Is night,—with Thee alone is day;
From out the torrent's troubled drift,
Above the storm our prayers we lift,
Thy will be done!

The flesh may fail, the heart may faint,
But who are we to make complaint,
Or dare to plead, in times like these,
The weakness of our love of ease?
Thy will be done!

We take with solemn thankfulness
Our burden up, nor ask it less,
And count it joy that even we May suffer, serve, or wait for Thee,
Whose will be done!

Though dim as yet in tint and line,
We trace Thy picture's wise design,
And thank Thee that our age supplies
Its dark relief of sacrifice.
Thy will be done!

And if, in our unworthiness,
Thy sacrificial wine we press;
If from Thy ordeal's heated bars
Our feet are seamed with crimson scars,
Thy will be done!

If, for the age to come, this hour
Of trial hath vicarious power,
And, blest by thee, our present pain
Be Liberty's eternal gain,
Thy will be done!

Strike, then the Master, we thy keys,
The anthem of the destinies!
The minor of thy loftier strain,
Our hearts shall breathe the old refrain,
Thy will be done! [J. G. Whittier.]

CHAPTER XXV.

THE ROAD TO RUIN.

MAUDE TREDETHLYN took her new life very pleasantly. Her father was happy. There had been a reaction in the City; things were going very well for the Australian merchant; and Francis Tredethlyn was receiving handsome interest for his thirty thousand pounds.

He brought these tidings to his wife's boudoir one morning early in the new year.

"I knew you'd be glad to hear it, Maude," he said; "and now you see that it was a very fine thing for me to get into your father's business. So you need not have been uneasy about the matter, my darling."

Mrs. Tredethlyn lifted herself upon tiptoe, and pursed up the rosiest lips in Christendom. A kiss, transient as the passing flutter of a butterfly's wing, alighted somewhere amid the thickets of the Cornishman's beard.

"You dear, good old Francis! That is the pleasantest news I ever heard, except—"

"Except what, darling?"

"The news that papa brought me home a year ago, when a generous friend stepped in between him and ruin."

Francis Tredethlyn blushed like a schoolgirl.

"Oh, Frank, if I should ever forget that day!" said Maude, in a low voice, that had something of sadness in its tone.

Was she thinking that there had been occasions since her marriage when she had almost forgotten how much she owed to the devotion of her lover—occasions on which some little social failure—some small omission or commission—some petty sin against the laws of the Belgravia and Tyburnians, had been large enough to blot out all memory of her husband's goodness? How can you remember that a man has a noble heart, when, for want of the ordinary tact by which well-bred navigators steer their barks amid the troubled waters of society, he blurs out some unlucky allusion which paralyzes the conversational powers of an entire dinner table, and brings blight and ruin down upon an assemblage which had fairly promised to be a success? Or how can you be expected to appreciate the generous spirit of a being whose ungainly elbow has just tilted half a dozen petites timbales de gibier into the ruby velvet lap of your most important guest?

There were times when Maude was forgetful of everything except her husband's genial good nature and unflinching devotion. There were other times when her heart sank within her as she saw his candid face beaming at her from the remote end of a long dinner-table, and heard his sonorous laugh pealing loud and long above the hushed accents of Belgravia.

He was her slave. If she loved him—and surely it was impossible that she could accept so much idolatry, and render no small tribute of affection in return—her love for him was pretty much of the same quality as that which she bestowed on her favorite Skye terrier.

He was such a dear, devoted creature—so sensible, so obedient; and if he did not quite stand up in a corner to beg, with a bit of bread upon his nose, it was only because he was not required to do so. He was the best of creatures—a big, amiable Newfoundland, ready to lie down in the dirt to be trodden upon by his mistress's pretty slipper, or to fly at the throat of the foe who dared to assail her. He was a faithful slave and defender, and it was very pleasant to know that he was always at hand—to be patted on the head now and then when he was specially good—to be a little neglected when his mistress was absorbed by the agreeable distractions of society—to be blushed for, and even disowned now and then, when his big awkward paws went ruthlessly trampling upon some of the choicest flowers in the conventional flower-garden.

He was her slave—her own. He loved her with an idolatrous devotion which she could rarely think of without smiling at his exaggerated estimate of her charms and graces. He was hers—so entirely that no possibility of losing him ever entered into her mind. He was hers, and we are apt to be just a little indifferent about the possessions we hold most securely. It had become a matter of course that her husband should scatter all the measures of affection at her feet, and hold himself richly repaid by any waif or stray of tenderness she might choose to bestow upon him. She had no uneasiness about him—none of those sharp twinges of jealousy—those chilling pangs of doubt—those foolish and morbid fears, which are apt to disturb the peace of even the happiest wife. She knew that he had loved her from the very hour of their first meeting, against his will, in despite of his better reason. She knew that he had been content to stand afar and worship her in utter hopelessness; and having now rewarded his fidelity, she fancied that she had no more to do, except to receive his idolatry, and smile upon him now and then when it pleased her to be gracious.

There was neither pride nor presumption in her nature, but she had lived all her life in one narrow circle; and she could not help being unconsciously patronizing in her treatment of the man who had taken Her Majesty's shilling, and blacked Harcourt Lowther's boots.

Francis Tredethlyn might perhaps have been entirely satisfied by brightly patronizing smiles and gentle pappings on the head, had he not been blessed with a friend and adviser, always at his elbow, always ready to step in with an intellectual lantern held gracefully aloft, and a mocking finger pointed, when the simple Cornishman's perceptions failed to show him the uncomfortable side of the subject.

"What a darling she is!" exclaimed Mr. Tredethlyn, as he left the house with Harcourt Lowther, after Maude had parted from him on the staircase all in a flutter of silk and lace, and with a feathery bush of golden hair framed in the last Parisian absurdity in the way of bonnets.

"Mrs. Tredethlyn is just the sort of wife for a man of the world," Harcourt answered, with a slight shrug of his well-shaped shoulders. "But I can't help fancying sometimes that you're too good a fellow to be thrown away upon the loveliest creature who ever isolated herself from the rest of the human race in the remote centre of a continent of moire antique. Of course I can't for a moment deny that you are the most fortunate of created beings, but—there is always a 'but,' you know, even if one has a beautiful wife and thirty thousand a year. I suppose it is the habit of my mind to quarrel with perfection. I think if I were a fresh-hearted, simple-minded fellow like you, Tredethlyn, I should yearn for something nearer and dearer to me than a fashionable wife."

The finger of Mephistopheles, always pointing, generally contrived to touch a sore place. Francis Tredethlyn, even when he had been happiest in the sunlight of Maude's smiles, had felt a vague sense of that bitter truth. She was no nearer to him than of old. The impassable gulf still yawned between them, not to be bridged over by pretty little courtesies or patronizing smiles.

But in spite of all inward misgivings, Mr. Tredethlyn turned upon his friend, and hotly denied the truth of that gentleman's observations.

Harcourt Lowther was quite resigned to a little fiery contradiction of this kind. The arrow went home to the mark; it had been shot, and rankled there. Such discussions were very frequent between the two men; and however firmly Francis might argue with his friend in the daytime, he was apt to lie awake in the dead of the night, like false cousin Amy in the poem, when the rain was pattering on the roofs of the palatial district, and wonder, with a dull aching pain in his heart, whether Harcourt Lowther was right after all; and Maude—sunny-haired, beautiful, frivolous Maude—would never be any nearer or dearer to him than she was now.

In the mean time, Mr. Lowther, who sowed the seeds of the disease, was always ready with the remedy; and the remedy was—dissipation.

Harcourt Lowther, in whose few years of legal study had been crammed the vicious experiences of a lifetime, was eager to perform the promise he had made to Francis Tredethlyn some two years before, when the young man first received the tidings of his uncle Oliver's bequest.

"I told you I'd show you life, dear boy," he said, "and I intend to keep my word. While Mrs. Tredethlyn amuses herself with the usual social treadmill business—perpetually moving on, and never getting any further—you and I will see a world in which life is worth living."

Thus it was that Francis Tredethlyn was lured away from a home in which he was taught to believe himself unappreciated, and introduced for the first time within the unholy precincts of the kingdom of Bohemia.

He entered the mysterious regions at first very reluctantly. He had the ignorant rustic's notion of Vice, and fancied that she would show herself in naked hideousness; but he found her with her natural face hidden under a plaster mask, modelled from the fair countenance of Virtue. It was something of a caricature, perhaps, for all imitations are so apt to become exaggerations. He found that Bohemia was a kind of Belgravia in electro-plate. There were the same dresses and properties—only a little tarnished and faded—the same effects always considerably over-done; the same jargon, but louder and coarser. Life in Bohemia seemed like a transpontine version of a West End drama, with cheaper scenery and actors and a more uproarious audience.

This was the kingdom with whose inner mysteries Harcourt Lowther affected a fashionable familiarity. He presented his wealthy friend to the potentates of the kingdom, and carried him hither and thither to worship at numerous temples, whose distinguishing features were the flare of gas lamps and the popping of champagne corks, branded with the obscurest names in the catalogue of wine-growers, and paid for at the highest rate known to the London market.

Perhaps in all his wanderings in the darksome wilderness which his mentor called London life, Francis Tredethlyn's worst sin was the perpetual "standing" of spurious sparkling wines, and the waste of a good deal of money lost at unlimited loo, or blind hookey, as the case might be. He had high animal spirits and thirty thousand a year, which common report exaggerated into sixty thousand, and which the more imaginative denizens of Bohemia multiplied into fabulous and incalculable riches, so he met with a very cordial welcome from the magnates of the land. But the descent of Avernus, however easy it may be, is a gradual slope, and not a precipitous mountain-side, down which a man can be flung headlong by one push from a friendly hand. Francis Tredethlyn yawned in the faces of the brightest stars in the Bohemian hemisphere. His frank nature revolted against the shallow falsehoods around and about him. The glare of the gas seemed to have no brilliancy, the bloom upon the women's faces was only so much vermilion and crimson lake bought at the perfumer's shop, and ghastly to look at in a side light. The laughter had the false ring of spurious coin; the music was out of tune. In all this little world there was no element of spontaneity; except perhaps in the uproarious gaiety of some boyish country squire making a railroad journey through some fine old property that had been kept sacred and unbroken for half a dozen centuries, to be squandered on a handful of pearls to melt in Cleopatra's wine, or expended on the soaps and perfumeries of a modern Lamia.

There was neither bloom nor freshness on anything except on the wings of a few pigeons newly lured into the haunts of the vulture tribe. Everything else was false, withered and faded. The smiles of the women, the friendship of the men, were as spurious as the rhubarb champagnes and gooseberry Moselles, and were bought and sold like them. Mephistopheles may lead his pupil to the Brocken, but he cannot compel the young man to enjoy himself amongst the wicked revellers; nor can he altogether prevent his perceiving such small inconveniences as occasional red mice hopping out of the mouths of otherwise charming young damsels.

Harcourt Lowther found it very hard work to keep Francis Tredethlyn amused, night after night, in remote and unapproachable regions, whose very names were only to be spoken in hushed accents over the fourth bottle of Chambertin or Clos Vougeot at a bachelor's dessert. Poor Frank would rather have been dancing attendance upon his wife, and trampling on the silken trains of sterner matrons and dowagers at the dulllest "Wednesday," or "Tuesday," or "Saturday," in all the stuccoed mansions in which Maude's pretty face and pleasant manners, and his own good old Cornish name and comfortable income, had secured his footing. He was very good-natured, and did not care how much bad wine he was called upon to pay for. He could lose a heavy sum at blind hookey without the faintest contraction of his black eyebrows, or the smallest depression of his lower jaw. But he did not enjoy himself.

He did not enjoy himself—and yet somehow or other he went again and again to the same temples, always under convoy of his friend Harcourt, and generally very firmly resolved that each visit should be the last. But there was always some special reason for another visit—an appointment with some elegant acquaintance of the vulture tribe, who wanted his revenge at blind hooky; or a little dinner to be given at the "Star and Garter," in honor of some beautiful Free-Lance, whose chief fascinations were the smoking of tissue-paper cigarettes, and a vivacious disregard of Lindley Murray. There was always some engagement of this kind; and as it happened somehow that Francis Tredethlyn generally found himself pledged to act as paymaster, it would of course have been very unmanly to draw back. If he could have sent his friend Lowther and a blank cheque as a substitute for his own presence, he would gladly have done so; but his friend Lowther took care to make this impossible. So the matter always ended by Mr. Tredethlyn finding himself, at some time on the wrong side of midnight, seated at the head of a glittering dinner-table; with the runs of an expensive dessert and the faces of his guests only dimly visible athwart a thick and stifling vapor of cigar smoke; while the clamor of strident laughter mingled with the occasional chinking and clattering of glass, as some applauding hand thumped its owner's approval of the florid sentiments in an eloquent post-prandial oration.

It is impossible to be perpetually paying for sparkling wines without occasionally drinking a little too freely of their bubbling vintage. Francis Tredethlyn, under the influence of unlimited Moët or Cliquot, found the Bohemians a much pleasanter kind of people than when he contemplated them in the cold gray morning light of sobriety. Harcourt Lowther took care that his friend should pretty generally look at things through a rose-tinted medium engendered of the juice of the grape, for he found that it was by this means alone that he could retain his hold upon his pupil.

Go where he might, the Cornishman carried his wife's image in his heart, and he would have left the most brilliant assemblage in Bohemia for a quiet tele-à-tele in Maude's boudoir, if his friend Harcourt had not carefully impressed upon him that his entrance into that pretty little chamber was an intrusion only tolerated by Mrs. Tredethlyn's good nature.

There is no need to enter very minutely upon the details of the work which Harcourt Lowther was doing. The art of ruining a well-disposed young man is not a very difficult one, but Mr. Lowther had reduced the art into a science. His great effects were not the sublime hazards of genius, but the calculated results of a carefully studied process. So many nights in a tainted atmosphere; so many "Star and Garter" dinners; so many subtle insinuations of Maude's indifference, must produce such and such an effect. Mr. Lowther displayed none of that impolitic and vulgar haste with which a meaner man might ruin his friend. He never hurried his work by so much as a single step taken before its time. He never wavered, or relented, or turned aside even for one moment from the course which he had mapped out for himself. So, in the course of that London season, it became quite a common thing for a street hansom to bring Mr. Tredethlyn to the gigantic stuccoed mansion which he called his own in the early sunlight of a spring morning. There were even times when the returning wanderer found it no easy matter to open a door with a patent latch-key, which would go meandering hopelessly over the panel of the door, scratching all manner of eccentric circles and parabolas on the varnish, instead of finding its way into the key-hole. There was one awful night on which Maude, coming home from some very late assembly, was stumbled against by a tipsy man who was groping his way up the great stone staircase, and found, to her unutterable horror, that the tipsy man—who apologized profusely for tearing half a dozen yards of mechin from the hem of her skirt, declaring that he was "ver' sorr,' pon m' word; b't'y' see, m' dea' Maurr, if y' w'll wear dress s' long, mussn' be s'prisc gett' t' pieces"—was her husband.

PHOTOGRAPHY AND GAME LAWS.—The Courier of Lyons tells a funny story about the arrest of a photographer for poaching. M. Garcin was taking "sun pictures" on the picturesque estate of M. B——, a well known preserver of game. While busily engaged with his head under the cloth, he was accosted by a gamekeeper. "Your name?" said the latter. "Garcin." "Your license?" "I don't shoot." "Pooh! what is that cannon for?" asked the keeper, pointing to the photographer's apparatus. M. Garcin, laughing heartily, endeavored to explain that it was for photography. "Oh! that is what you call it, eh?" cried the man, "I shall draw up a proces verbal." And he proceeded to write in his memorandum book to the effect that on a certain day of a certain month, he had discovered a poacher, named Garcin, pointing a cannon at the birds in the hedges, etc. After this important record had been made, the keeper told the photographer that he must go with him before the mayor. When the case was heard by the magistrate, it of course created great amusement; but it was long before the keeper could be convinced of his error. Perhaps he was not thoroughly satisfied even when the photographer, having recovered his apparatus, showed him the portrait of himself as he appeared watching the "poacher" through an aperture in the hedge.

THE PANTELEGRAPH.

WE have had several times occasion to mention the Abbe Casalli's wonderful invention, by which he not only transmits from one place to another the words of a despatch, but the very handwriting of the person who sends it. As this new telegraphic system is now beginning to receive a practical application on a large scale, a description of the apparatus may not be uninteresting to our readers.

Imagine a cast-iron frame shaped like an A, and a pendulum suspended from its apex. At each foot of the frame there is an electro-magnet, through the action of which the pendulum, which is two metres in length, oscillates between them, according as an electric current passes from one to the other. About the middle of the shaft of the pendulum there is a sort of arm or cam, which, at each oscillation, causes a lever, fixed to the cross-bar of the A, to describe a circular arc. At the end of each oscillation the lever twice meets a click and spring-work fixed to the same cross-bar. At the first stroke the metallic vibration is interrupted, and at the second, a fork is set in motion, the prongs of which alternately act on the teeth of a ratch, which is thus forced to turn, and, in so doing, communicates motion to an endless screw cut into its own shaft. This endless screw causes two small chariots to move simultaneously; each chariot carries a fine steel point or stylus. Now, as in virtue of the endless screw these two points move uniformly in the same direction—the progress of the one not differing from that of the other even by a hair's breadth—it follows that whatever stroke will be described by the one will be imitated with mathematical exactness by the other. Now suppose a metallic plate to be placed under each point, these plates being curved like the circular arcs described by the points, then, after a certain number of oscillations of the pendulum, these points in moving along will have described upon the plates as many parallel lines indefinitely close to each other as there have been oscillations; hence, the whole surface of the plates has been gone over. The plates are in direct communication with the ground by means of chains; one of the plates we will call the transmitter, the other the recipient. The sender of a despatch writes it with common ink on a sheet of tinned paper, and places it on the transmitter. On the recipient we place a sheet of chemical paper, impregnated with a solution of cyanide of potassium.

Let us now set the apparatus in motion. The current being established, so long as the point of the transmitter only touches the tin, the electric fluid escapes into the earth; but no sooner does it meet the ink of the writing, which is a non-conductor, than the fluid, not finding an escape there, will seek it along the wire which connects the two points together. Thus the point which works on the chemical paper of the recipient will produce a blue stroke on the latter for every black stroke on the despatch, for steel in contact with cyanide of potassium, and under the influence of a positive current, produces blue. Hence, supposing the despatch to have been written in black in Paris and transmitted to Lyons, the correspondent at the latter place will receive in blue the exact facsimile of the sender's handwriting. An order to pay a certain sum may thus be transmitted with perfect safety.—Galigiani.

ANECDOTES OF BEETHOVEN.

MULLER'S "Furioso," a novel based on some incidents of the composer Beethoven, has been lately published. The opening chapter of the book is conventional enough to usher in a common-place Romance. "One bright June morning," it commences, "in the year 1782, might have been seen among the low grounds at the foot of the Seven Mountains, lying between Königswinter and the Oelberg, a slight, well-grown youth, in the dress of a student of the period." The "slight, well-grown youth" is Professor Wegeler, who, in his wanderings in search of plants and insects, is overtaken by a violent thunder-storm. "The rain poured down in great heavy drops," (we are told,) "the lightning was incessant, whilst the convulsed atmosphere sought relief in continued discharges of thunder." In the midst of this deluge of rain, Wegeler beholds "a short muscular form, whose long black hair and garments were alike the sport of the tempest." The "singular individual," as he is called, unmindful of the drenching he was receiving, proceeded with a stick, which he beheld in his right hand, to conduct the thundering storm. "Now an allegro!" he cried. A flash of lightning succeeded his command, terminating in a roll of continued thunder. "Adagio maestoso!" he then vociferated. And, apparently upon his bidding, followed an equally protracted growl of thunder. "Prestissimo furioso!" shouted the weather-director; and exactly as if the heavens were really subservient to his commands, now rounded a tumultuous crash of elements, answering to a wild symphony, in which one strain or instrument strives to drown another.

Students of Beethoven who would wish to trace, through the pages of Dr. Wolfgang Muller, how the "child" was "father of the man," may accept this as a fair specimen of the style of the book; and we can assure them that there is no little ingenuity displayed in forming a continuous story out of such materials as were furnished by the simple diary of Professor Wegeler. The introduction of the young Beethoven (or "Furioso," as he is nicknamed) to Count Waldstein, who becomes his firm friend: his intimacy with the Von Bruening and Von Hourath families, with his love affairs, are told with surprising accuracy; as also his interview with the Emperor Joseph II., where he meets a "little man," with whom the Emperor is evidently on the most friendly terms.

"Have you already played Mozart's music?" demanded Joseph of Beethoven, winking at the little man.

"Certainly," answered the youth.

"And what is your opinion of him?"

"That he is the most melodious, graceful, and inexhaustible master that the world has ever known," said Beethoven.

"Perhaps Sebastian Bach stands higher in church music, and Handel in Oratorios; but on the stage the Salzburg composer excels even Gluck in finish, and in a characteristic representation of individuals and scenes."

After Beethoven had played an air of Mozart's, upon which he extemporized some variations, and a pianoforte composition of his own, which the "little gentleman" pronounced "not only of the highest order, but original throughout," the climax is brought about with a thorough knowledge of effect, thus:

"And your conclusive opinion of this young Bonn musician?" asked the Emperor of his companion.

"He will be among the first masters of the art," he said emphatically; and he reached Beethoven his hand.

"And do you know who delivers this judgment?" said the Emperor, turning to the youth.

Ludwig looked steadily at the little man. "No," he answered.

"It is that of Wolfgang Amadeus Mozart," said the Emperor, with emphasis.

Beethoven's heart bounded within him.

SECRET SORROW.—"McArone," in the N. Y. Review, after showing up various phases of "secret sorrow," so prevalent among the love-sick swains and pining maidens who contribute of their woes to fill the columns of trashy, sensational weeklies, concludes his essay seriously, as follows:

Of course, there is such a thing as a real, noble, and dignified sorrow; one which cannot be cured, and which must be concealed. I am not one of those heartless cynics who can find nothing worthy in the romantic element of the human character, and I have known and revered one young man who had to bear a grief he could neither heal nor share with the gay world in which he was compelled to move.

He was, by nature, a fine, frank, honest fellow, with a strong tinge of refinement. Wealthy, surrounded by devoted friends, and betrothed to a charming girl who loved him almost to idolatry, there was yet a strange anxiety in his air when I first met him, that betrayed to my observant eye some worm in the bud, some skeleton in the closet, which was all unseen by even his most intimate friends.

I found him, several times, earnestly contemplating himself in a mirror with a pained and haggard look, as one might who sought, only too successfully to trace the first symptoms of some fatal and agonizing disease.

Often, when in company, he appeared preoccupied with saddening thought, and frequently passed his hand across his lips, as if to check the outburst of some fearful declaration, which might astound and horrify all who knew him.

Naturally, as a student of human nature, this case interested me powerfully, and I hoped to discover the cause of my friend's sorrow, in order to allay or mitigate it, if possible.

To this end, I cultivated the growing intimacy between us, and bore most patiently the pain of seeing his mute endurance of a mighty woe.

We occasionally spoke on the subject of hidden sufferings, but he resisted all my attempts to gain his confidence, and invariably asserted that he was the happiest man he knew.

We went fishing together, once—ah, how well I remember that day! The weather was warm, and we had walked far, and on our return I was glad to lie down on a sofa by an open window, with a mild cigar and a glass of iced brandy-pawnee close by, to get cool and rested.

Overcome by the drowsy warmth and gentle breeze, the faint hum of flies in the window-pane, and the twittering and whispering of birds and insects outside, I fell into a sort of doze, and must have lost consciousness for some moments, for when my perceptions returned, I was aware that some person had entered the room.

I had not the energy to thoroughly arouse myself at once, but partially opening my eyes, I saw my poor suffering friend standing near the window, with a small mirror in his hand, closely scrutinizing something about his face.

I gave no sign of being awake, and he must have supposed me to be deep in slumber, for all at once his horrid secret leaped from his heart to utterance, and the mystery was revealed in one eloquent outburst.

"Yes," he said, with an agonizing gasp; "yes, that moustache is growing, but by heaven, I knew it—I knew it—it's redder than thunder!"

THE LAST SACRIFICE OF THE NATION.

IT is but a short week ago that in these columns we endeavored to point out what seemed to be the evident theory of the Administration in regard to the final settlement of our national troubles, and which was to prepare the people in the fullness of victory for that calm and dispassionate policy which was the natural and fitting expression of two of the most calm and dispassionate patriots who ever graced the councils of our country. The damnable act of treachery which on Friday last struck down the foremost of these leaders, and only failed through an excess of impotent rage in completing the assassination of his first minister, though seemingly a convincing refutation of their arguments for conciliation, has in the subtle logic of events produced even greater results than that for which they labored. The dagger of the assassin severed the bonds that linked the Northern Copperhead with the Southern rebel, and forever divorced their unholy alliance. It will be the additional punishment of the assassin to know that his treachery was double—that his crowning act was a death-blow to his party, and that the few sparks of feeble glory, which in the eyes of other nations might have obtained with the rebel soldier who in fair battle killed his enemy, is forever clouded by this infamous act of his cowardly accessory!

The history of reform and progress is the history of sacrifice. We might have fondly hoped that the blood which the North has freely poured from loyal veins during this war would have been sufficient for our atonement. But it seemed otherwise: it was but enough for the battle-fields of the Republic, and the open conflict. Providence decreed the assassination of the President as the one awful crime that could alone disorganize the opposition in our midst—that could alone shame the wretches who struck hands with undisguised traitors; and upon them, rather than on their agents, does Providence place the onus of this last and more terrible sacrifice. And thus, on this hecatomb of the Nation's dead, is placed him whose kindly heart and tender sympathies were quickest to appreciate the offering, and, who, up to the last moment of his life, labored to bring about conciliation and concord.

Had personal hatred inspired the assassin, the same short-sighted logic, which his act, viewed as a political deed exhibits, would have frustrated his object. The terrible baptism of blood has cleansed the official robes of Abraham Lincoln of all earthly impurities. This day he stands for his fame, perhaps higher than had a kindly Providence vouchsafed to him a peaceful retirement after the labors of his administration with reunion perfected and prosperity restored to his beloved country. In the light of this most piteous and untimely deed, his record stands spotless, free from the stains of selfishness or ambition which triumph and praise might have hereafter brought. Again, in all cases of human sacrifice, the principle, and he who died for it, are irrevocably linked, and go to posterity together. The apotheosis of Abraham Lincoln occurred on Friday week, and the alternate defeat or triumph of policies or parties, the incoming or outgoing of administrations touch him no longer. The Wise and All-ruling Destiny, who provided the assassin as a tool for its secret purposes, can well afford and even pardon the miserable men, should there be any, who at this juncture might be found to exult over this foul murder!

Meantime, the Government has slipped, almost unconsciously, into the hands of the succession, without jarring or derangement of its perfect mechanism, without a single questioning doubt or perplexity—a thing unknown to any other polity or government extant! A great people, with arms in their hands, and still heated with the excitement of conflict, have received the news of the most cruel and fearful outrage that could be perpetrated upon them, calmly, nobly and with dignity—without a single retaliating act toward the prisoners whom the fortunes of war had thrown into their hands, and whose presence might well excite the bitterest feelings—without aggressive acts toward the covert traitors whose utterances in the plenitude of their power they had so long permitted and whom they could so easily crush—without passion, at a time when passion were most pardonable—affording altogether a spectacle of moral sublimity, unexampled in the history of nations.

OUR LAST OFFERING.

IF I had not heard the terrible news and were inclined to write upon some other topic, I fancy that I should be dimly conscious of a something in the air—a moral miasma tainting the free atmosphere and benumbing the play of brain and fingers. As it is, there is an indefinable magnetism in the grief of twenty millions of people; a strange and new sense of insecurity in those things which we have hitherto looked upon as most secure, which disturbs that mental equipoise most conducive to composition. My pen, accustomed to deal glibly enough with fiction and abstract character, moves feebly and finally stops still before the terrible reality of this crime which has put a nation in mourning, and leaves my poor tribute an uninterpreted symbol upon the altar-tomb of a man whose honesty, integrity and simple faith I most revered and respected. It is the cruel fate of the imaginative scribbler, that finding a tongue for fanciful griefs, or the remoter afflictions of others, he is too often denied expression to those real sorrows which touch him more closely.

Abler pens than mine have demonstrated how the rhetoric of chivalry, which expressed itself in the attack on Charles Sumner, found a fitting climax in the assassination of Abraham Lincoln, but as yet I have not seen recorded that which seems to me to be a better illustration of their peculiar logic. Four years ago the Slave Power accepted the usual arbitrament of the ballot-box with seeming faith and sincerity. Their principles were fairly defeated, and they made war on the nation. Four years later and the remnants of the same power in the North again submitted their principle to a like arbitrament. They were again defeated—and they assassinated the President!

No other public man seems to me to have impressed his originality so strongly upon the people as did Abraham Lincoln. His person and peculiar characteristics were the familiar and common property of the Nation. In his character and physique the broad elements of a Western civilization and topography seem to have been roughly thrown together. The continuity of endless rivers and boundless prairies appeared to be oddly typified in his tall form and large and loosely-jointed limbs, and that uncouth kindness of exterior which in nature and man sometimes atones for the lack of cultivation. His eloquence and humor partook of the like local and material influences, mixed with that familiar knowledge of men and character which the easy intercourse of the pioneer had fostered, and the whole, seasoned with those anecdotes which, like the legendary ballads of early European civilization, constituted the sole literature of the Western settlements. Let me go further and say that, in my humble opinion, he was, as a representative Western man, the representative American. That correct and sometimes narrow New England civilization and its corresponding crisp and dapper style of thought, which for years represented the North in the councils of the Nation, has always seemed to me to be at best an English graft, which if it has not dwarfed the growth or spoiled the vitality of the original stock, has at least retarded the formation of National character. Nor do I say this with any the less reverence for that Puritan element, and its deep reliance in the familiar presence of God, which I believe has to-day saved this Nation. Yet there has always seemed to me to be a certain grim, poetic justice and symbolic meaning in the providential selection of this simple-minded, uncouth and honest man, in preference, perhaps, to one of our more elevated and elegant philosophers and thinkers, as the instrument to humble white-handed and elegantly-dressed arrogance—this cheap chivalry of the circus-rider which has imposed on so many good people—the sophistries of truth and position, and the last expiring remnants of feudalism and barbarism. I know of no more touching illustration of the instinctive appreciation of this fact in the Nation than that spectacle which the advertising columns of the newspapers offer in the many resolutions of condolence and sympathy from all organizations of trades and workingmen, and the sorrowing faces of the mechanics who walked in last Wednesday's procession.

Even as the martyrdom of this great and good man brought him down to the level of the humblest soldier who died upon the battle field for his country, so the common sympathy of our loss has drawn us all closer together. Nor has the great law of compensation failed us now; already we can fancy our national atmosphere is cleared by a people's tears, and the soil beneath quickened to a more spontaneous yielding. Leaving out the peculiar circumstances of our great sorrow, it has seemed to me that any event which could bring thirty millions of people in solemn and closer relations to their God is not altogether profitless. Perhaps it was necessary that we of the North, engaged in peaceful avocations, who had never really appreciated the magnitude of our soldiers' sacrifice, should be thus brought to a nearer contemplation of violent death; that we who read of the slaughter of twenty and thirty thousand men with scarcely a tremor of the voice or quickened pulse, should be stricken into speechless tears and sorrow by the death of a single man. Knowing this, I believe that our nation stands to-day nobler and purer in faith and principle than ever before since the April sunshine glanced brightly on the bloody dews and green sward of Lexington, and believing thus, can echo the poet's tribute to one who passed away but a short year before, and perhaps stood first to welcome the martyred hero.

"Mingle, O bells along the western slope
With your deep toll a sound of faith and hope!
Droop cheerily, O banners, half-way down,
From thousand-masted bay and steeped town;
Let the deep organ, with its loftiest swell,
Lift the proud sorrow of the land and tell
That the brave sower sowed his ripened grain."

ABRAHAM LINCOLN.

RETURNING spring had just begun to gladden the earth with flowers and with verdure; the air was filled with songs of triumph, and came warm from the south with suggestions of speedy peace, when suddenly a cry of horror and a wail of anguish vibrated through the whole land. Our joy was turned into mourning. The cup of gladness which we had but just tasted was dashed to the ground, and in its place the poisoned chalice was commended to our lips.

If life were not full of shocks and surprises, of abrupt meetings and of sudden partings, of unexpected successes and of unforeseen reverses, we might fold our arms and lie upon our oars, as we sail the sea of Time, forgetful of the great currents and of the heaven-born winds which bear us on.

But no such tranquil progression is ours. No sooner do we adjust ourselves to one position than we are called to another, and the forces which play into our lives are more numerous and more subtle than we suspect.

If we seek to solve the problem of a nation's fate, we find more unknown quantities than independent equations, and Providence seems to delight in startling our best-laid plans and bringing about results by new and sparkling methods of its own.

We count upon men to carry out our wishes and schemes. But the continuance of any one life is, of all earthly things, the most uncertain. As no reasoning can estimate the violence of private malice or measure the infinite baseness of which it is capable; so no forethought or precaution can avert its effects. Assassination is the last act of frantic desperation and of deadly hate. It is an acknowledgment of weakness, a renunciation of all fair and equal encounter, and a resort to the treacherous and stealthy spring of the tiger with a fiendish malevolence, compared with which the tiger's hunger and rage are virtues.

Our chosen chief has fallen by such a blow—at a time, too, when we had come to love and to trust him as few men are ever loved and trusted. He had won our hearts by his honesty, his courage and his fidelity to the great trusts imposed upon him. We admired his simplicity of character, his moderation, his strong good sense, and his earnest and pithy eloquence. We honored him that in an age of time-servers and self-seekers, he stood up for the oppressed, and through evil report and through good, never swerved from his allegiance to the cause he had espoused.

He was a genuine son of America, the natural product of our country and her institutions. Foreign schools, and foreign arts and refinements had done nothing for him. He was all our own. Nurtured in the school of soil and privation, we loved him as we love the rough granite cliffs of New England, as we love the broad prairies of the West and the great rivers of the land. He came into office when our land was quaking with convulsion and discord. He stood between two mighty opposing forces. Is it strange that he was crushed by the collision? As few have been so loved few have been so hated. To the one portion he was the conservator of their national unity, the power of their strength; to the other he was the embodiment of all they most feared and hated.

When an earthquake at Rome opened a deep gulf in the midst of the forum, after long efforts to fill up the chasm had proved unsuccessful, the oracle gave response to the anxious inquiries of the citizens that they should cast therein that which constituted their chief glory; and after treasures and votive offerings had proved unavailing, Marcus Curtius offered himself to die, asking what greater glory had Rome than the valor and devotion of her sons. And in the presence of assembled multitudes of Rome, he cast himself into the gulf of Rome's calamity. No earthquake hollowed the abyss which has yawned in our midst—but two hundred years of a mighty wrong excavated the dark gulf which has for many years divided us. Into it we have cast our treasures, the accumulated wealth of years of peace, but still it has yawned black and bottomless. Into it we have poured the blood of our bravest and best. Was it necessary that our chosen one, our chief on whom we had lavished our highest honors should sink into the same unfathomable vortex? He would not have shrunk from the sacrifice if he had known it inevitable or necessary. He never avoided danger, but was ready at all times to go wherever his presence was needed. A mysterious Providence did not allow him to anticipate even for a moment the doom impending over him. He was spirited away in an instant. We saw him one moment full of life, health and vigor. The next and nothing remained of our great leader—not even consciousness of the terrible fate that had befallen him. No word of parting, no faltered farewell broke the suddenness of our loss. Sudden as lightning was the revengeful blow. That lofty form is laid low, but his principles are marching on, and even amid the peal of his death knell we catch the notes of triumph swelling up from our victorious host. Like Moses he was not permitted to enter the promised land of peace and restored harmony. He had conducted us for four years through the wilderness of war. He was permitted only to see the dawn of a brighter day. Through many long and weary marches he had climbed the summit where he could look down upon a land of peace, plenty and of righteousness, and like Moses upon the mountain from that pinnacle of vision he must be torn away from our sight.

THEATRICAL TALK.

ON Monday, the Octoroon was played for the benefit of Mr. Charles Wheatleigh. I was glad to see a good house on that occasion. Mr. Wheatleigh had worked hard to deserve it. Charles R. Thorne was kindly welcomed by the audience; he played the part of "McCloskey" villainously—that is, he was everything that could be desired. McCloskey being a villain. With Wheatleigh as "Salem Scudder" and Thorne as "McCloskey," and the other characters admirably distributed, the play, of course, went well. It was repeated the following night.

Wednesday the theatre was closed in consequence of the mad crime of an actor within the walls of another theatre where was enacted a darker tragedy than has ever entered the mind of dramatist to conceive.

Thursday the Colleen Bawn was born again and borne very patiently by the audience.

Friday, Watts Phillips' comedy of Paul's Return was produced, Wheatleigh playing "Abel Honeydew" and Thorne "Paul Goldsworthy." The performance closed with the farce of A Model of a Wife. Wheatleigh's personification in this of the Frenchman "Pygmalion Bonnetoi" is inimitable. I have seldom seen it equalled.

To-night Rachel the Reaper will be performed, on which occasion I am able to state authoritatively, sickles will appear on the stage. This play is of the sickly sentimental order of domestic drama. The afterpiece will be the never-tiring Bull in a China Shop. The audience will easily swallow "Rachel the Reaper" when such a bonne bouche is given them to take after it. The reign of merry Thalia ends to-night.

On Monday stern, pale visaged Melpomene takes possession of the stage in the person of her great high-priestess Miss Heron. Wheatleigh resigns his post of stage manager, to Graves and a grave season commences. "Let's talk of graves, of worms and epitaphs" and Medea and Camille. Miss Heron opens in her greatest impersonation, namely, that of Gamea the Jewish Mother. In this she is grand, almost sublime in some portions, and good throughout. Her acting is in this role more even than in any other. Miss Heron's farewell engagement is short.

The American Theatre company has broken up.

The Circus season has commenced. Cooke, Zoyara and Wilson's Grand Combination Circus gave their first exhibition in the Pavilion on the lot adjoining the International Hotel, on Friday, to a concourse of some 2,500 spectators. The celebrated James Cooke, from Astley's Theatre, London, is the clown. His jokes, which, wonderful to relate, were new, excited immense applause. The great features of the entertainment were the performing dogs, monkeys and mules, who were quite the stars of the evening. This is decidedly the most perfect equestrian troupe which has ever visited this city. Little Gemma is the most fearless of riders. Peoples is immense in his four-horse act, and Olma, who is called the great Octomiraculous, surpasses even the famed Orriu brothers' gymnastic feats.

The San Francisco Minstrels have left the Eureka tenantless, they were, when last heard of, in Sacramento, doing a good business.

The New York Herald's Washington despatch says it was ex-Governor Farwell, of Wisconsin who notified Mr. Johnson of the murder of Lincoln. Mr. Johnson had retired for the night when notified. Prompt measures were taken for his protection. But for this presence of mind on the part of Governor Farwell, in all probability Mr. Johnson would also have been murdered.

RICHARD CORDEN, the great English reformer, is dead.

THE NEW TAVERN.

OUR latest exchanges tell us there is something on the brain of Boston. It seems a pity. For the less intelligent of our readers we will state, to give geographical location to that place, that it is situated in the province of Massachusetts Bay, a great way down East, near the State House of that province, is within three miles of Harvard College and can easily be seen from the shaft on Bunker Hill. It is usually a very quiet little place, has a good many pious Puritan descendants in it, does nothing very immoral in its corporate capacity and is excited by things not very great in themselves. It is "pleased with a trumpet." A while ago it got a big trumpet, a sort of many-barrelled affair, and put it into the place where the great theologic gun, Theodore Parker, used to give the Puritans the scent of heretic powder. Everyone who went to the town didn't see the elephant, unless he saw the great organ. The papers talked about it. The Autocrat filled a dozen pages of the Boston magazine about it. The thing itself spread its own magnificent tones all over Boston and vicinity and the fame of its noise reached even Sacramento and Slug Gulch.

What is now animating that quiet little burg is the project to build a new tavern. Everybody is interested. Apparently almost everything else is forgotten, at any rate laid aside until this is properly arranged. One of our oldest Boston exchanges gives portions of three columns to this item of immense importance. Indeed the number appears with a supplement, with no other apparent reason than that the quiet people, after taking their tea, must gossip over the new idea. It speaks of it editorially; it speaks in many-tongued correspondents, and it gives place to the wise "opinions of the press." Every conceivable question connected with its incipency is thoroughly argued. Several things bother the good people, however. There is no doubt in the world but that it can be built if somebody will start a subscription paper. Almost everybody is convinced that it is needed, and there is a college close by where a person can be educated "to keep a tavern" or patronize one. One editor says that "to secure the capital, erect the building upon a plan at once generous and commensurate with the progress of the age in the art of hotel building, and see it in full and successful operation are the main object; names and sites will take care of themselves." Now that is very like a snub on some of the enterprising correspondents who appear in the same issue. No less than eight communications treat of those very things which the editor very ungraciously insists will take care of themselves. It's hardly fair in a person who writes regularly for a newspaper, to brush aside his correspondents' ideas as he would July flies.

The name also bothers a great many people. One says "Boston Hotel" is proper, and the editor endorses that; another, "St. Botolph's House" (evidently been reading up on the history of old Boston); another likes "Hotel America," (with a foreign accent,) but is afraid that people from the State of Maine might take it for the "American House;" one would glue the name of "Phillips" (Boston's first Mayor) on to it somewhere; another echoes "Russell House," for "the late Maj. Russell," that is, in case they buy the church property in Summer street, because the Major used to go to church there; one says "Beacon House" would have a decidedly recherché significance; and another don't care much what they call it, so long as they put "Boston" before it. Who can sleep in such a state of things? You it's see a matter of immense importance, and it is hoped that whatever they do, the old ladies will finally settle on a real nice name, such as good Bostonians may always pronounce with affection. If it wouldn't be obtrusive, we would like to suggest a name, and, as a Boston physician has circulated the idea that that town is the hub of the universe, would like to propose (nemo contradicente) that the new tavern be called the Hotel de Hub.

Then there's the location. Five correspondents suggest desirable localities, without mentioning the unimportant fact as to whether they are possessed in fee simple of either. Besides, some well-known old localities, certain unknown new ones are spoken of. If Boston has any particular genius, it is for writing books, and, next to writing books, making dry land. Only a little while ago there was quite a large puddle of water, which the funny Bostonians called the Back Bay, just the other side of the "Public Garden" where little children go to bear the parrot and play horse on the grass. What do you think they did? Somebody said that if there was a paradise on earth it was Beacon street. But it wasn't a half big enough paradise for so many nice people as lived in Boston. The commonest sort of people (those who, after death, go to East Boston,) had used up all the rest of the town with buildings. Consequently they went to work and made some more town, which was all to be "up-town" for the "upper-ten," and in the celestial records would stand next to Beacon street. And we believe it does. Nobody but nice people live there, in nice houses. And for a site for the new tavern, one correspondent says this can't be beaten. He thinks Commonwealth Avenue is just the place for the (no doubt to be called) "Commonwealth Hotel." And to tell the truth, there is one recommendation. He gives the price of land as $3 to $4 per foot. Cheap as dirt can possibly be anywhere! Maybe he means a square foot, but probably a front foot. Think of it! Rooms and board in a hotel built on land at such economical rates must be cheap. We engage an extensive suite of apartments at once. Montgomery street is cheap at $1,000 per foot. We will not be particular about the acceptance of our name, but would like this location availed of immediately.

We do not mean to dictate in regard to anything connected with this new Boston project. We are glad to see that the Boston public want, as one correspondent writes, "no six-penny concern, but a grand, commanding house; to use a common phrase, 'a smasher.'" Is it strange that, with the "six penny concerns" that Boston abounds in, one of the press pathetically says: "If a stranger comes hither he can generally procure lodging and enough to eat and drink, but does he have anything approaching 'entertainment' with which a Metropolitan hotel delights its guests, and which even a comparatively modest establishment like the Continental makes every visitor sorry when his time has come to move on?" To think that Puritan Boston should be obliged to take off its hat to the Quaker City! It's awful for Boston! In a few months these entangling problems will be solved, we trust, and then the good Bostonians can quietly eat at the new tavern, receiving "entertainment" and paying liberally for some one to turn the crank of the new organ while they eat.

SHAKESPEARE ON THE ASSASSINATION.

"—Besides, this Duncan
Hath borne his faculties so meek, hath been
So clean in his great office, that his virtues
Will plead like angels, trumpet-tongued, against
The deep damnation of his taking off;
And pity, like a naked, new-born babe,
Striding the blast, or heaven's cherubim, bore'd
Upon the sightless couriers of the air,
Shall blow the horrid deed in every eye,
Till tears shall drown the wind."

The most arch deed of piteous massacre
That ever yet this land was guilty of."

And this so sole, and so unmatchable,
Shall give a holiness, a purity,
To the yet-unbegotten sin of time;
And prove a deadly bloodshed but a jest
Exemplary by this heinous spectacle."

"If thou didst but consent

To this most cruel act, do but despair,
And, if thou want'st a cord, the smallest thread
That ever spider twisted from her womb
Will serve to strangle thee: a rush will be
A beam to hang thee on; or, wouldst thou drown thyself,
Put but a little water in a spoon
And it shall be as all the ocean,
Enough to stifle such a villain up."

[King John, Act iv., sc. 3.

"The time approaches
That will with due decision make us know,
What we shall say we have, and what we owe
Thoughts speculative their unsure hopes relate;
But certain issue strokes must arbitrate:
Towards which, advance the war."

THE OPERA.—The sad events of the past week have not offered a very auspicious opening for the new troupe. Lucia di Lammermoor was given on Monday night (subscription night) to a very crowded house; but the following evening—a gala night—when La Traviata was performed, the attendance had dwindled to half the number. Signora Brambilla has a sweet though not powerful voice, with not much artistic execution. Morley, the tenor, is unsatisfactory—often giving promise of an ability which he does not sustain, and becoming "flat." Morrelli, the baritone, with an organ of considerable compass, does not seem to have much cultivation, and does not always show a just conception of the spirit of the music which he sings. The chorus is good, and the orchestra excellent. There is a perfection and liberality in the manner in which these operas were placed upon the stage which give credit to the management.

The Mendocino Democrat says an effort is being made to establish a daily mail route from Petaluma to Humboldt Bay, via Ukiah City, with good prospects of success.

PARISIAN GOSSIP.

THE REVENGE OF ARTISTS.

NUMEROUS are the stories told of the tricks by which artists have avenged the disdain of their clients. The anecdote of Mr. Hope ("Anastasius") is too well known to be repeated. I may tell a less familiar one in which one of the best known bailiffs in Paris figured. He had acquired a considerable estate in his trade, and determined that the effigy of him who had assembled all this gold should descend with them who were to enjoy it. No testator dreads the garret. Lord a mercy! heirs would be unlucky dogs did they so much as suspect that an heir's house contains such a room! He went to Dubufe and ordered his portrait. When the portrait was executed Dubufe sent for the model.

"Great Heavens!" exclaimed the bumbailiff, "you don't mean that fat fellow is I?"

"My dear fellow, artists adore nature with too much fervor to correct her."

"And that I have such a proboscis—for it is not a nose—the elephant in the Garden of Plants hasn't a larger one!"

"Look in the mirror."

"Besides, when did you ever see me squint?"

"Ever since I made your acquaintance."

"Then you are blind. That portrait is not in the least like me, and I formally refuse to accept it."

"Oh, very well! Good morning," said Dubufe, bowing him out of the house.

The bumbailiff went away rubbing his hands, delighted at having got rid of a "bad bargain."

Dubufe sent for a lithographer and had an exact copy made of his picture and had several hundred extra impressions struck off. He went to the court house regularly and obtained a list of all arrests for debts ordered. He at once sent to the debtor menaced with arrest a copy of his lithograph which bore this legend: "Monsieur —, Bumbailiff."

The bailiff's reputation (it avouched him the best shot in Paris and was the source of his estate) began to wane. He could not bag any game. The moment a debtor caught sight of his face the former fled. Losing business fast, the bailiff began to investigate the cause of it, and at last discovered it. He burst into Dubufe's studio in a fury, screaming:

"You ought to be ashamed of yourself!"

"Why so? Because I have an ill-tempered fellow bawling here?"

"Because you are ruining me."

"Ruining you?"

"Sir, do you suppose that I am ignorant that you send my likeness to all debtors under arrest in Paris?"

"Your likeness—you don't mean the portrait of that fat fellow (you are not that fat fellow) with a proboscis (you have no proboscis, the elephant at the Garden of Plants has that appendage) and who squints (nobody ever saw you squint); you don't call that caricature your l-i-k-e-n-e-s-s?"

The bumbailiff saw he was caught in the springes, and being a shrewd fellow, he good humoredly said:

"Well, after all, you may send that ugly fellow around to my house. What is your bill?"

Horace Vernet had a similar quarrel with the Fould family. The father of the present Minister ordered his portrait of this great artist. Vernet painted a noble piece. Old Mons. Fould asked the price, and the artist said $15,000. He invariably charged $5,000 for an equestrian portrait. This seemed an outrageous extortion to old Mons. Fould, who had all his life been accustomed to contemplate money in its infinitesimal forms—sixteenths of one per cent. and twentieths of one per cent. and such "small deer"—and he refused to pay it. Horace Vernet did not bring suit, neither did he quarrel. He was then giving the last touches to his picture, which represented the capture of Abd-el-Kader's Smala. He introduced into the scene a rascally-faced Jew pedler, who, while all the rest were fighting to defend their chief and his family, thought of nothing but running off with his goods to some safe place. This Jew pedler was instantly recognized for old Mons. Fould. You may trace the likeness to the Minister of Finances whenever you go to Versailles.

ARISTOCRATIC KLEPTOMANIA.

The menials here are a vile race. They played a shabby trick on the Countess de — on New Year's Eve. I don't say she did not deserve it, still it is notorious that people afflicted with her monomania cannot be considered free agents. She is fond of petty thieving. When she dines out she cannot help smuggling a portion of the dessert into her pocket. She robs the sugar-dish when she can. In the Bois de Boulogne she gets out of her carriage and picks up sticks of dried wood. This is quite a common monomania here. There are ladies of the oldest family and highest rank who cannot enter a dry goods' shop without stealing. Their regular tradesmen have been notified by the families to keep a strict watch on them and to charge everything they steal. The Countess de — is one of these unfortunate women. She is wealthy, but she will pilfer. She spent New Year's with an old friend with whom she dines at least once, and oftener twice than once, a week. Before she joins the company in the drawing room she is accustomed to go into her friend's chamber to prepare herself for the social circle. She places on the bed her bonnet, boa, muff and shawl. The chamber is heated by a porcelain stove—the most delightful heater you can conceive, it is far superior to your warm water apparatus—and near it stands a chest filled with small sticks of wood. The Countess de — has long been in the habit of taking one of these billets of wood and concealing it in her muff to gratify her mania for pilfering. She takes it when she enters the bed-chamber and hides it under the eider-down of the bed until her departure when she slips it into her muff. One night the maid detected the Countess de — and as the latter had failed to give her the expected vails, she determined upon revenge. After the Countess de — had as usual hid a little stick of wood under the eider-down the chambermaid quietly slipped the largest billet she could find in the wood cellar into the place of the little stick which she withdrew. As the Countess de — was about taking her departure she attempted her wonted trick of legerdemain: but the billet was not to be moved by any sleight of hand. The Countess de — turning deadly pale, quivered like an aspen leaf and retreated with the utmost embarrassment. She went home and has been quite sick ever since. The chamber-maid has very properly been dismissed.

A RUSSIAN ECCENTRICITY.

While I am speaking of Russians let me narrate the eccentricity of one of them, who is just now the lion of Paris. I never saw such a looking brute. I never saw a human face divine degraded by so much sensuality. His wealth is something enormous. I will not challenge your credulity to its utmost verge by hinting only figures. This I may, however, say. He went recently to a stock broker and ordered him to buy some three per cents., that he might not have too much money lying idle at Rothschild's bank. "How much shall I buy?" inquired the stock broker. "Well, I really forget, I believe somewhere between six and eight millions of dollars." Can you conceive of a fellow "out" by one or two millions of dollars? He has two cousins here whom he detests, and who hang on him as iron filings on the magnet. Who does not hang on his rich kin? He summoned them to his study the other day and held this language: "I know we are of kin, but I came to Paris to enjoy myself and the continual sight of you does greatly lessen the pleasure of my life in Paris. How it is I don't know. Doctor Fell—the reason why I cannot tell." Now if you will promise me to leave Paris and never set your foot again in it I will give you $1,200,000 a piece." The offer was accepted. He gave them a check on Messrs. De Rothschilds and they quitted Paris that night. "Spiridion" in the Boston Gazette.

ALL'S WELL.

The day is ended. Ere I sink to sleep
My weary spirit seeks repose in Thine;
Father, forgive my trespasses, and keep
This little life of mine.

With loving kindness curtain Thou my bed,
And cool in rest my burning pilgrim feet;
Thy pardon be the pillow for my head—
So shall my sleep be sweet.

At peace with all the world, dear Lord, and Thee,
No fears my soul's unswerving faith can shake;
All's well! whichever side the grave for me
The morning light may break!

LIFE IN AN ENGLISH UNIVERSITY.—The Cornhill Magazine furnishes some curious specimens of college life in England. There is nothing the students so much dread as the word "Examination," and from the following answers of the undergraduates to certain questions, we should judge they would have some fears in passing through such an ordeal. Many stories are always afloat of wonderful blunders in divinity; some, of course, are inventions, and other facts, or founded on facts. We give a few extracts:

Examiner—"What can you tell me about St. Paul?"
Under-graduate—"He was also called Saul, and brought up at the foot of Gamaliel."

Examiner—"Yes, quite right. What do you know about Gamaliel?"

Under-graduate—"It is a mountain in Galilee."

The next, we believe, may be credited to Cambridge:

Examiner—"Why did Moses leave Egypt?"

Under-graduate (with hesitation)—"Why, sir—hem—hem—"

Examiner—"Come, come, answer if you know."

Under-graduate—"Well, sir, I suppose that little affair with Potiphar's wife."

For the following we do not attempt in any way to vouch, although we have heard its authenticity strenuously asserted:

Examiner—"Why was John the Baptist beheaded?"

Under-graduate (faltering)—"Because he would dance with Herodias's daughter."

THE New York Albion regards Louis Napoleon as "master of the art of using language for the purpose of concealing thought."

GOSSIP ON ART, MUSIC, ETC.

ALLUDING to the Grand Opera House in Paris, a French correspondent makes the following calculation: The new Grand Opera will cost thirty millions, which, at 5 per cent., represent an annual interest of 1,500,000f. But the full highly receipts of the house being 12,000f., and there being a hundred and twenty performances in the year, the annual receipts will be 1,440,000f., thus showing a deficit of 60,000f.; and in this estimate are not reckoned the salaries of the actors and dancers, the costumes, management—all that enormous outlay which has gained, as I think unjustly—look at Covent Garden, the Scala of Milan, the Pergola at Florence, and the Opera House at Reggio—the reputation for the Grand Opera of the theatre of Europe.

"Spiridion" says: They say we are to lose Mlle. Pattl. She is to marry a Russian whose estate yields $1,800,000 a year! But what should she care for money? Already she is in receipt of a larger income than most princes in Europe, and, what is more agreeable than money, she receives applause night after night from men of all parties, from women of the Faubourg St. Germain, Faubourg St. Honoré, and Chaussée d'Antin. This music will cease after marriage. Why then should she marry? Domestic felicity is not to be found in a Russian's home. It is a title which fascinates her? Sontag was more illustrious than the Countess Rossi and attracted admiring glances which the whole line of Countesses Rossi could not have won. I suppose it is the old story of the roc's egg. We ever pant for that which we have not, and loathe what we possess.

THE Medea of Chernbini is to be one of the principal novelties this season of Her Majesty's Theatre. It has never yet been heard in England. The "Medea" will of course be Mlle. Titiens, who in that great part is likely to present to the operatic world a new "Fidelio." Another novelty is to be Mozart's Die Zauberflöte.

IN Rome Faust is given, but "Mephisto" is changed into a half-crazy doctor. The devil is not allowed to appear in Rome on the stage, as the Pope thinks that there is enough mischief played besides. La Favorita, as performed in Rome, is played among the Turks, and the monks are transformed into dervishes.

A NEW opera, Concini, by Thomas Lowe, has been given with doubtful success in Vienna. Critics blame the composer for slavishly copying Meyerbeer and Wagner, and being trivial in his melodies, and noisy to excess in his instrumentation.

THE director of the Leipzig theatre is about to try a bold experiment. Between the present time and June the whole cycle of Shakspeare's Historical Plays, from Richard II. to Richard III., will be put upon the stage in chronological succession. The arrangement will be that made by Herr Dinglestedt of Weimar, where the same cycle was given in two series of successive evenings.

IN the library of San Marco, in Venice, nineteen songs written by Stradella have been discovered. They have been put into Halévy's hands, who has written a pianoforte accompaniment to them.

THE Count de Chambord's pictures are announced for sale in Paris. The Duchess de Berri became security for the debts of her husband, Count Luchessi-Palli. A subscription was entered into last year by the ladies of the Faubourg St. Germain, which reached 100,000 francs. That sum being inadequate to the demands, the Count de Chambord has released his mother from the liability, and undertaken the payment of the debts. Hence the sale.

THE political life of Lord Palmerston has been longer than that of any statesman of the present century. That of Prince Metternich lasted fifty-four years; that of the Duke of Wellington little more than forty-six years; that of Robert Peel even still less. But Lord Palmerston entered the House of Commons in 1806, and has held his office, with slight intermission, since 1807, or fifty-seven years.

THE model of an electro-magnetic locomotive is now on exhibition at Versailles. Its inventors, MM. Bellet and Rouvre, assert that locomotives constructed on their principle could travel on ordinary railroads at the rate of one hundred and twenty-four miles an hour! The power is obtained by magnetizing and de-magnetizing, by means of a current supplied by a fixed battery.

MISS BATEMAN having played no other character than "Leah" in the drama of that name, during her brilliant career in London and the provinces, the announcement that she would perform "Julia" in the Hunchback, filled the Adelphi theatre with a most expectant audience. The London Times, in criticizing her performance, says that the ordeal was triumphantly passed, and that those who hesitated during the first act rose to acclamations at the fourth. The young lady had to prove that she was not a "one part" actress, and her proof has more than surpassed all expectations.

THACKERAY used to relate with great glee the following humorous story: An Irish gentleman, well-known in town, and from whom the character of the Mulligan was partly drawn, walking in the park with a young friend, received a bow from Dean Stanhope, who was passing by, and said to his friend in a rich brogue, "That's a Danc!" "Oh, no," replied the other, "you're mistaken; it's Mr. Stanhope, an Englishman." Upon which the offended Mulligan thundered forth, "Tis not a Dane of Sweden that I mane, sir, but a Dane of the Church!"

STOP THAT COUGHING!

SOME of you can't, and we pity you. You have tried every remedy but the ONE destined by its intrinsic merit, to supersede all similar preparations. It is not surprising you should be reluctant to try something else after the many experiments you have made of the trashy compounds foisted on the public as a certain cure; but

NEWELL'S PULMONARY SYRUP!

It is really the VERY BEST remedy ever compounded for the cure of Coughs, Colds, Sore Throat, Asthma, Whooping Cough, Bronchitis and Consumption. Thousands of people in California and Oregon have been already benefited by the surprising curative powers of

NEWELL'S PULMONARY SYRUP,

And with one accord give it their unqualified approbation. We now address ourselves to all who are unacquainted with this, the greatest Panacea of the age, for the healing of all diseases of the Throat and Lungs, assuring you that NEWELL'S PULMONARY SYRUP

HAS CURED THOUSANDS!

And it will cure YOU if you try it.

This invaluable medicine is pleasant to the taste; soothing, healing and strengthening in its effects; entirely free from all poisonous or deleterious drugs, and perfectly harmless under all circumstances.

A THING OF BEAUTY

IS A JOY FOR EVER!

And the choicest attribute of beauty is a fine complexion. Oriental travellers note with rapture

THE DAZZLING BEAUTY

of complexion possessed by the Persian Ladies, and state that it is due solely to the use of a toilet preparation in great repute among them. The secret of this preparation has always been zealously guarded, but, by a singular chance, came into the possession of Mr. W. B. Champlin, who now offers it to the public under the name of and invites attention to its rare merits.

HOSTETTER'S CELEBRATED STOMACH BITTERS.

A TIMELY WARNING TO THE SICK.—It is especially important at this time, when the markets of the United States are flooded with the direct poisons, under the name of imported liquors, and when domestic compounds, purporting to be medicinal, but not a whit less pernicious, are heralded to the world as "sovereign remedies," that the public should fully understand the facts. Be it known, then, that while all the diffusive stimulants called liquors are noxious, and all the Tonics containing alcohol are manufactured with a fiery article containing arsenic or fixed oil, a mortal poison; HOSTETTER'S CELEBRATED STOMACH BITTERS contain none of these things, but are a combination of pure Essence of Rye with the pure juices of the most valuable stomachic, antibilious and aperient herbs and plants, and that as a safe and rapid remedy for Dyspepsia and all its kindred complaints, this preparation stands before the world without a rival or competitor. Its sales to-day are equal to the combined sales of all the other Tonics advertised in the United States, and the certificates which authenticate its usefulness are signed by individuals of the highest standing in every professional calling and walk of life. Beware of imitations and impostures.

FARRAND'S OSCILLATING Amalgamator.

THIS UNRIVALLED IMPROVEMENT FOR THE REduction and amalgamation of Gold and Silver Ores, is now running daily at No. 206 Commercial street, between Front and Davis.

THIS AMALGAMATOR INVOLVES
NO COMPLICATED MACHINERY

And possesses the following advantages over all others now in use:

1st It is capable of doing double the amount of work of the ordinary Pans, at a saving of more than one-half the power.

2d. It reduces the pulp finer, thereby producing a better result.

3d. It requires less quicksilver by one-half at a charge, whilst the lossy triturator is comparatively nothing.

4th. As an Amalgamator for gold contained in sulphurets, as also for very fine or flour gold, it has no equal.

5th. This Amalgamator involves no complicated machinery, and is less liable to get out of order than any of the pans.

DESCRIPTION OF FARRAND'S AMALGAMATOR.

In offering this Amalgamator to the public the inventor does not claim any new or scientific method of extracting the precious metals from the ores; he merely claims a new and simple combination of mechanical principles, whereby a great saving of power (full one-half in amount) is effected. The capacity of the machine varies with its size. The smallest, or prospecting size, will reduce 400 lbs. in three hours, and can be easily worked by the power of one man. The largest size will work 1,500 lbs. in three hours, or six tons in 24 hours, with an application of a trifle more than one-horse power. This saving of power, as all mill-men are aware, is an important consideration particularly where fuel is scarce.

The power so saved in running the Amalgamators may be advantageously employed to an increase of stamps, and thus proportionally increasing the work of the mill. This machine consists of a semi-cylindrical, trough-shaped vessel, in the interior of which is furnished with moveable concave dies, to be replaced when worn out, as in ordinary pans. The millers are convex, and attached to a substantial rock shaft, by which they are moved back and forward by crank or eccentric motion. The millers are held to their places by springs of moderate strength, the pressure of which may be easily regulated. The oscillating motion of the millers serves to keep the pulp in a constant state of agitation, thoroughly mixing it, and passing it under the millers without resort to any of the various expedients employed in Pans where a circular motion is maintained. The peculiar construction of this machine admits of its being worked with a much smaller charge of quicksilver, to any given amount of pulp than the flat-bottomed Pans. The spiral springs greatly assist in the work of reduction, by allowing the free admission of the pulp between the millers and dies, so that the pulp is made to actually work upon itself—as the dust of the diamond is made to reduce the gem itself. The advantage derived of thus avoiding all trituration in the presence of quicksilver, must be apparent to any one at all acquainted with gold or silver amalgamation.

Trials made with this machine in the presence of experts, during the last six months, have been pronounced highly satisfactory. It is peculiarly well adapted to employment by small mining operators in distant localities, as it can readily be taken to pieces and packed upon mules.

A large size machine is constructed without dies or millers, but simply with arms to act as stirrers, to be used in connection with several of the Amalgamators as a "Separator," as it is found that the peculiar motion given to these arms, in connection with the concave shape of the body of the machine, renders it most effectual for such a purpose.

RECORD OF THE CAMPAIGNS.

ONE by one, the pillars which upheld the tottering fabric of the so-called Southern Confederacy are tumbling down, and the ruin which threatened is already full upon it. The dreadful crime just added to the dark list of villainies, sinks the authors of this causeless war still deeper in the lake of eternal execration. The "record" of this week is a series of the successes which, since the last grand blow was struck by Grant on the James, have been following upon the track of the Union armies. We can afford to feel but faintly glad, after all; smiles through tears are but as sunshine through showers—there is a moist sadness over all:

On the 17th of April, General Joe Johnston surrendered his entire army to Gen. Sherman. The rebel generals have expressed their desire to submit to the United States authorities.

A flag of truce came from Imboden on Saturday. It was believed that his object was to surrender his forces as part of Lee's army.

In the attack on the defences at Mobile on the 9th, the Union forces captured Spanish Point Fort, 800 prisoners, 25 cannon and five mortars falling into their hands. The greater part of the garrison escaped by water. On the same day, Blakely was also captured, and all the rebel forts with 2,400 prisoners and 20 guns.

The expedition of Gen. Stoneman, which left Knoxville on the 10th of March, struck the East Tennessee and Virginia Railroad on the 14th of April, at Wytheville, Christiansburg and Salem. Between these points twenty-three bridges were burned and twenty-five miles of track totally destroyed. The expedition met with great success. Stoneman captured Salisbury at 10 A. M. on the 12th. The following is a list of what fell into our hands:

Eight stand of colors, nineteen pieces of artillery, eleven hundred and sixty-five prisoners, one thousand stand of arms and accoutrements, one million rounds of small ammunition, ten thousand fixed ammunition and shell, sixty thousand pounds of powder, seventy-five thousand complete suits of clothing, three hundred and fifty thousand army blankets, twenty thousand pounds of bacon, one hundred thousand pounds of salt, twenty thousand pounds of sugar, twenty-seven thousand pounds of rice, ten thousand pounds of saltpetre, fifty thousand bushels of wheat, one hundred thousand dollars worth of medical supplies and seven thousand bales of cotton. Thirteen pieces of artillery were brought away, and all the other stores not needed for the immediate command were destroyed.

The greater part of these supplies had just been received from Raleigh. One large arsenal, with machinery complete; six depots, two engines and trains and several bridges between Greensburg and Danville, and also on either side of Salisbury, with several miles of railroad track, were destroyed. We lost very few in killed and wounded. Among the latter was Capt. R. Morrow, A. A. G. of Stoneman's staff.

Mobile surrendered to Gen. Grauger on the 12th inst.

The Herald has received a special despatch from Winchester stating that Moseby had surrendered to Gen. Chapman on the 17th inst., on the same terms as were granted to Lee. Rosser is also willing to surrender on the same conditions. Moseby's men number 700. Great numbers of Lee's soldiers are arriving within our lines.

It is reported that the rebels have destroyed their Navy Yard on the Roanoke river. Two vessels, one ram and a gunboat were also destroyed.

MR. SEWARD RECOVERING.—The latest despatches state that Secretary Seward is recovering rapidly. He was able to be assisted from bed, and, supported at the window, witnessed the passage of a portion of the general procession of Mr. Lincoln.

Robert Dodge of Nevada has been sentenced to be hung on the second of June next, for the murder of Mark P. Hammock, of Allison Ranch.

On Tuesday last James Hynes shot and killed a man named Leonard R. Jones, at Rhodes' Diggings, with a shot-gun, and immediately after came to Folsom and gave himself up. Jones died. The prisoner underwent an examination before Justice Quigley, who rendered a verdict of justifiable homicide and discharged Hynes.

The Sacramento Bee says: "The contractors are vigorously pushing the work on the Pacific Railroad between Latrobe and Shingle Springs—the track being put down as fast as the road is levelled. Several hundred men are at work at that point, and at the latter place, a depot, freight, and warehouse are to be erected. By June 1st the road will be in running order to that point.

Frank Powsen made an assault on a storekeeper named Friedman, at Dutch Flat, March 25th, knocking him down, when parties interfered, took Powsen off and tried to get him out of the store. Friedman on getting up got a revolver and fired two shots, one taking effect in Powsen's right arm, and the other in his right breast. There had been an old quarrel between the parties.

EVERGREENS—THE LAUREL.

THE Greeks and Romans consecrated crowns of laurel to glory of every kind. With them they adorned the brows of warriors and poets, of orators and philosophers, of the Vestal Virgin and the Emperor. Laurel, (Laurus), is from the Celtic blaur or laur, signifying green. The Laurus Nobilis is found in abundance in the island of Delphos, where it grows naturally on the banks of the river Peneus. There its aromatic and evergreen foliage is borne up by its aspiring branches to the height of the loftiest trees, and it is alleged that by a secret and peculiar power they avert the thunder-bolt from the shores they beautify. The beautiful Daphne was the daughter of the river Peneus. She was beloved by Apollo, but preferring virtue to the love of the most eloquent of gods, she fled, fearing that the eloquence of his speech should lead her from the paths of virtue. Apollo pursued her, and he caught her; the nymph invoked the aid of her father and was changed into the Laurel.

In the age of Roman greatness, this tree was considered as the emblem of victory, and also of clemency. The victorious generals were crowned with it in their triumphal processions, every common soldier carried a sprig of it in his hands, and even the despatches announcing a victory were wrapped up in and ornamented with leaves of the laurel or bay. The aromatic odor of these trees was supposed by the ancient Romans to have the power of dispelling contagion, and during a pestilence the Emperor Claudius removed his court to Lauretine, so celebrated for its bay trees.

Theophrastus tells us that superstitious Greeks would keep a bay leaf in their mouths all day to preserve themselves from misfortunes. The Greeks had also diviners, who were called Daphnephagi because they chewed bay leaves, which they pretended inspired them with the spirit of prophecy. The Bay was dedicated to Apollo, and the first temple raised to that god at Delphi was formed of the branches of this tree. It was the favorite tree of the poets, and we are told that Maia, the mother of Virgil, dreamed she was delivered of a bay tree, and that one of these trees sprang from Virgil's ashes, and is still growing over his tomb. Even in later times it was supposed to be a safeguard from lightning; and Mme. de Genlis mentions the device of the Comte de Dunois, which was a bay tree, with the motto: "I defend the earth that bears me." It was a custom in the middle ages to place wreaths of laurel, with the berries on, on the heads of those poets who had particularly distinguished themselves; hence our expression, "Poet Laureate."

In our own free land, where letters are so extensively cultivated, they who succeed in exciting popular favor meet with more remuneration than in ancient days; but how few have been honored as highly as their merits demand, until the last debt of nature has been paid! And then the marble bust, wreathed with bay, is raised to immortalize their fame when their ears are become deaf to praise. They seldom receive the honors due while they enjoy the beauties of this terrestrial globe. Clare has said in his address to a poet:

"The bard his glory ne'er receives
Where summer's common flowers are seen,
But winter finds it when she leaves
The laurel only green;
And Time, from that eternal tree,
Shall weave a wreath to honor thee."

Students who have taken their degrees at the Universities are called bachelors, from the French Bachelier, which is derived from the Latin Baccalarius, (a laurel berry.) These students were not allowed to marry, lest the duties of husband and father should take them from their literary pursuits, and in course of time all single men were called bachelors. This tree is mentioned by Chaucer as the crown of all the Knights of the Round Table. All of the laurels are more or less aromatic, and produce camphor, cinnamon, nutmeg, cassia and other fruits and products of commerce.

All of the hardy evergreen kinds are very ornamental, and should be grown in every well-kept place.

The following classification will serve as a guide to those who would cultivate the particular kinds alluded to:

Laurus Nobilis (noble) or Bay from South of Europe.
" Crisped (curled-leaved) " " "
" Flores pleno (double-flowered) " " "
" Latifolia (broad leaved) " Asia.
" Salicifolia (willow-leaved) " "
" Undulata (wavy-leaved) " "
" Variegata (variegated) " "
" Regalis (royal) " California.

THE War Department offers a reward of $50,000 for the arrest of the assassin of the President, and $25,000 each for the arrest of G. A. Alsora and David C. Harold, accomplices of Booth. All persons harboring or secreting said persons, or either of them, will be treated as accomplices in the murder of the President, to be subject to trial before a military commission.

March 9th, O. J. Stone, formerly a resident of Orleans Bar, Klamath county, was shot dead by Sanford Jacques. The murderer has been arrested and is on his way to the county jail at Crescent City.

PTOLEMY'S TREASURES.

IT is hardly necessary to remind those who have any acquaintance with general literature, and with history in particular, of the innumerable vulgar errors that creep into books, and the many historical falsehoods which, from the mere force of repetition, end by being adopted as truth.

Among this last may be included the accusation against Omar of having destroyed by fire the books contained in the library of Alexandria. Many authors have pointed out the error of this imputation, and the German Reinart even published in Göttingen, in 1792, a special dissertation on the subject; so it might have been supposed that, except among village pedagogues, the question was set aside; but lo and behold! in a report of the meeting of the Academy of Sciences in Paris, May, 1857, M. le Baron Dupin, the spokesman of the Academy, informs the public, with much gaiety, that "Omar, the General of Mahomet, having conquered the Valley of the Nile, his Lieutenant, Omron, suggested to him the formation of a canal direct from Suez to Pelusium; but an ignorant who could be guilty of burning the Alexandrian library was not likely to possess sufficient capacity to entertain so grand an idea."

A short notice that appeared in a bibliographical journal pointed out the many errors contained in these few lines. First, the Caliph Omar never conquered the Valley of the Nile. Secondly, he could not have rejected the idea of the construction of a canal from Suez to Pelusium, for the very good reason that the canal already existed. And, lastly, he did not burn the Alexandrian library, as it had been destroyed two centuries and a half previously.

In order that we may leave no further room for a doubt on this point, let us return to the proofs furnished us by history against the unpardonable assertion made by a member of the French Academy. It is well known that this celebrated library was founded by Ptolemy Soter. According to St. Epiphanius, the number of volumes amounted to 54,800. Josephus says that it contained 200,000. Under the successors of Ptolemy the number gradually increased to 700,000; but by volumes must be understood rolemaux, which contained much less than our modern books.

Julius Caesar, being besieged in the city of Alexandria, set fire to the fleet in the port. The wind carried the flames to some distance, and thus caused the first conflagration of this famous library. Later, a new one was founded; but in 390, under Theodosius, after a sanguinary contest between the heathens and the Christians, this building was completely destroyed from top to bottom, the library pillaged, and the books dispersed. Twenty years later, the historian Orosius exclaimed sorrowfully, "We have lived to see the shelves empty on which once stood the volumes destroyed by the men of our age."

It now remains to be seen if, after this second destruction, a third library was formed. No author makes mention of it, and history proves that, during the greatest part of the period up to the year 640—the date of the taking of Alexandria by the Arabs—men of letters and philosophers were persecuted, and the collecting of books neglected. The wars, too, civil and foreign, exhausted the resources of the empire, and allowed no time for the cultivation of literary tastes.

Anyhow, if a third library was formed, of which there is no mention whatever, it cannot have been of any magnitude or celebrity.

M. Lalanne, in his Curiosités Bibliographiques, very justly surmises that the origin of this error lies in an Arab author of the eighth century, Ebn-Khaldoun, who, in reciting the conquests of the provinces of Persia by the Mahomedans, says that "Saad, the general who commanded the latter, wrote to Omar to ask permission to carry away the books; and that Omar replied, 'Throw them into the water: for if they are in accordance with the truth, God has taught us better things in the Koran; and if they contain error, they ought not to be preserved.'" Now let us see who was the first to propagate the fiction of the burning of the Alexandrian library. They were two Arab doctors and historians; one died in 1231, the other in 1286, that is to say, six centuries after the event they record. Now how is it to be accounted for that, during these six centuries, no author has ever made allusion to so important and so remarkable an event—not even Eutychius, an historian of the end of the ninth century, who has left us a detailed account of the taking of Alexandria?

It is more natural to suppose that the two authors who invented the destruction by fire of this library, found an analogous fact in a history of the eighth century, and adapted it to another circumstance, as was frequently the custom with the chroniclers of the Middle Ages.—Octave Delepierre.

THE ELECTROPATHIC INSTITUTE, No. 645 Washington street, established February 12th, 1860, by an association of scientific gentlemen, for the cure of disease and the suppression of quackery.

Persons suffering from disease can rely upon the most scientific and honorable treatment at the above Medical Institute, and should their cases be within the limit of cure, the Resident Physician will warrant them a perfect and permanent relief from their affliction. And if their case be incurable, he will so state, and advise them of the best method of relief, so far as science can go to accomplish the object.

The basis of treatment at the Institute is the electro-pathic system; but the Resident Physician, J. H. JOSSELYN, M. D., being a graduate of the University of Pennsylvania, considers himself competent to treat with medicines, but, in no case, will he make use of mercurials, those life-destroying drugs; but, instead, will use the most approved vegetable remedies.

Since the establishment of the Institute, almost every nameable disease has been treated with success, especially those complaints which have been ill-treated by quacks, the names of which should never be printed in a newspaper.

Females should bear in mind, that the only safety in the treatment of complaints peculiar to their sex, is to have a physician who has made the female economy his particular study. In the resident physician at the Institute, they will find a surgeon who can sympathize with them in their troubles, and relieve them, no matter what they may be.

To the rheumatic and nervous person, this Institute offers the blessing of certain and permanent cure.

For those suffering from the effects of mercury, and those diseases for which mercury is usually given, there is no remedy so sure as the Electropathic system, as practiced at the Institute, 645 Washington street.

Come one, come all, and receive the blessings of health!

The motto is—a perfect cure or no money required! All letters answered with promptness and with pleasure, if directed to

ALLEN'S

LUNG BALSAM!

THE REMEDY FOR CURING

CONSUMPTION, COUGHS, COLDS,

ASTHMA, CROUP,

DISEASES OF THE THROAT, BRONCHITIS,

Pains and Oppression of the Chest or Lungs,

DIFFICULT BREATHING,

AND ALL THE

DISEASES OF THE PULMONARY ORGANS.

ITS ACTION IS EXPECTORANT, ALTERATIVE, SUDORIFIC, SEDATIVE, DIAPHORETIC and DIURETIC, which renders it one of the most valuable remedies known for curing diseases of the lungs. It excites expectoration, and causes the lungs to throw off the phlegm or mucus, changes the secretions and PURIFIES THE BLOOD; heals the irritated parts; gives strength to the digestive system, brings the liver to its proper action, and imparts, beyond the possibility of doubt, strength to the whole system. Such is the immediate and satisfactory effect, that it is warranted to break up the most distressing cough in a few hours' time, if not of too long standing. It is warranted to give entire satisfaction even in the most confirmed cases of Consumption. It is warranted not to produce costiveness, which is the case with most remedies, or affect the head, as it contains no Opium in any form. It is warranted to be perfectly harmless to the most delicate child, although it is an active and powerful remedy for restoring the system. There is no real necessity for so many deaths by Consumption, when ALLEN'S LUNG BALSAM will prevent it, if only taken in time.

A REQUIEM and a jubilee!
 An infant born, a mother dead!
 A storm without, a wail within!
 A starless heaven overhead!
 A father's half-averted eye!
 Hot tears above a white robe shed!
 A flickering firelight in the room,
 Strange shadows swaying mid the gloom,
 A broken flower, a bud's fresh bloom,
 A life that wrought its giver's doom!

Thus welcomed in an ominous hour,
 A new soul awakened on the earth,
 With snow and hail on striving winds,
 With death and sorrow on the hearth!
 What fate is hid in coming years
 Thus heralded by such a birth?
 A loveless childhood, wild and lone!
 A youth of yearnings crush'd, unknown!
 A heart with idols overthrown!
 A woman's lot! Moan, baby, moan!

THE THREE WISHES.

THERE was once a wise Emperor who made a law, that to every stranger who came to his court a fried fish should be served. The servants were directed to take notice if, when the stranger had eaten the fish to the bone on one side, he turned it over and began on the other side. If he did, he was to be immediately seized, and on the third day thereafter he was to be put to death. But, by a great stretch of imperial clemency, the culprit was permitted to utter one wish each day, which the Emperor pledged himself to grant, provided it was not to spare his life. Many had already perished in consequence of this edict, when, one day, a Count and his young son presented themselves at court. The fish was served as usual, and when the Count had removed all the fish from one side, he turned it over, and was about to commence on the other, when he was suddenly seized and thrown into prison, and was told of his approaching doom. Sorrow-stricken, the Count's young son besought the Emperor to allow him to die in the place of his father; a favor which the monarch was pleased to accord him. The Count was accordingly released from prison, and his son was thrown into his cell in his stead. As soon as this had been done, the young man said to his gaolers, "You know I have the right to make three demands before I die: go and tell the Emperor to send me his daughter, and a priest to marry us."

This first demand was not much to the Emperor's taste, nevertheless he felt bound to keep his word, and he therefore complied with the request, to which the Princess had no kind of objection. This occurred in the times when kings kept their treasures in a cave, or in a tower set apart for the purpose, like the Emperor of Morocco in these days; and on the second day of his imprisonment the young man demanded the king's treasures. If his first demand was a bold one, the second was not less so; still, an Emperor's word is sacred, and having made the promise, he was forced to keep it; and the treasures of gold and silver jewels were placed at the prisoner's disposal. On getting possession of them, he distributed them profusely among the courtiers, and soon he had made a host of friends by his liberality.

The Emperor began now to feel exceedingly uncomfortable. Unable to sleep, he rose early on the third morning and went with fear in his heart to the prison to hear what the third wish was to be.

"Now," said he to his prisoner, "tell me what your third demand is, that it may be granted at once, and you may be hung out of hand, for I am tired of your demands."

"Sire," answered his prisoner, "I have but one more favor to request of your majesty; when you have granted, I shall die content. It is merely that you will cause the eyes of those who saw my father turn the fish over to be put out."

"Very good," replied the Emperor, "your demand is but natural, and springs from a good heart. Let the chamberlain be seized," he continued, turning to his guards.

"I, sire!" cried the chamberlain; "I did not see anything—it was the steward."

"Let the steward be seized, then," said the King.

But the steward protested with tears in his eyes, that he had not witnessed anything of what had been reported, and said it was the butler. The butler declared that he had seen nothing of the matter, and that it must have been one of the valets. But they all protested that they were utterly ignorant of what had been charged against the Count; in short, it turned out that nobody could be found who had seen the Count commit the offence, upon which the Princess said:

"I appeal to you, my father, as to another Solomon. If nobody saw the offence committed, the Count cannot be guilty, and my husband is innocent."

The Emperor frowned, and forthwith the courtiers began to murmur; then he smiled, and immediately their visages became radiant.

"Let it be so," said his majesty; "let him live, though I have put many a man to death for a lighter offence than his. But if he is not hung, he is married. Justice has been done." Once a Week.

EYES.

ASK, in any game of question and answer, what is the most beautiful thing we can take in and consider at a glance; and amongst the various answers—a rose, a lily, a star, a pearl, a dew-drop, a crescent-moon, a butterfly, a swan, a white hand, a tress of golden hairs—perhaps the most popular would be the eye, the eye of an innocent child, or beautiful woman, or man of thought and genius. And, in spite of the grave poet's contempt for frivolous men,

To whom the stars are not so fair as eyes, we hold this answer to be the best; for where, in small compass, shall we find such a variety and harmony, and, above all, such a unique charm distinct from all others of its kind, and suggesting thoughts beyond itself, which is the especial province of the highest beauty?

Poets and authors do well to impress on men the worship of the eye, and the study of its language; it is the speciality of their class. As a body, they themselves are neither beautiful nor imposing; indeed it is well if the author or authoress is not, to the unintelligent observer, the least noticeable of any company. But they have eyes—eyes to attract, arrest, and impress—eyes to assert for their owners their legitimate claim on attention:

There are who to my person pay their court,
 I cough like Horace, and though lean am short.
 Ammon's great son one shoulder had too high,
 Such Ovid's nose, and "Sir, you have an eye."

And, after all, no one need complain of his share of nature's favors who has eyes that will worthily represent the best part of him. Many, we really think the majority, do not think much about eyes, unless they are prompted. Half the people one asks do not know the color of the eyes of their best friends, and have nothing to say about them; but a clear, penetrating, responsive eye has, all the same, its magnetic effect upon them. These are the eyes that are unconsciously sought for, watched, appealed to, and often with such intentness upon their meaning that the homeliness of the adjacent features is all forgotten. There are times when the eye absolutely beautifies and transfigures all about it. Even where the mouth seems to have all the business of expression, as in the smile, the eye is often the real artificer. The lips perform the desired movement, but we lack the light which kindles and beams in concert, and, if this is wanting, the smile is but a dead affair even on beauty's lip, till we ask:

Give her nothing, but restore
 Those sweet smiles which heretofore
 In her cheerful eyes she bore.

Addison says that good breeding has the tongue, but nature keeps the eyes to herself. We are afraid, however, that people can feign with their eyes pretty nearly as well as with their tongue. We do not mean in the mere arts of flirtation, where, as Thackeray has it, the beauty "makes great eyes" at her adorer, but in the case of this particular smile; though possibly, where the eye calls up the genial look, the intellectual effort is greater and more lasting. An engaging manner is always befriended by obedient eyes. We are disposed to think that some consciousness of beauty is necessary for the full fascination of eyes. We have known a face of perfect regularity, and eyes worthy of the "stage-eyed" queen fail of effect from the perversity which made the owner of these attractions careless of beauty, and intent solely on proving herself a superior woman. But this consciousness may be merely an effect of general homage quite separable from vanity. This is the look which gives to Sir Joshua Reynolds' beauties their sweet living charm—their eyes smile upon us in such security of our good-will. Another delightful effect is described by Shakespeare's term "young-eyed;" where the eyes are unconscious of self because they are ever looking out in eager hope and expectation of pleasure and happiness. Nothing in this world is pleasanter to look upon than this particular glance of a beautiful young face, so free, so bright, so seeking, so without guile or misgiving. Such a look cannot remain long; indeed it ought not, for it would degenerate into something hard and unthinking; but it subsides, in the right subject, into the honest eye which tells a plain tale so well. All honest people, however, have not what is called an "honest eye." It does not belong to the deeper, more intricate class of thinkers, and perhaps it is, moreover, incompatible with reserve. There are people who don't like to make too free with their glances, who could not put on the frank look without effort, and the sensation of a stare. It is a gift to be able to look men in the face, but it is not all people's way; and though many persons have this reluctance in common with stage villains, and some real scoundrels, it implies nothing worse in them than a troublesome, and perhaps painful, self-consciousness.

Big eyes, though so much is sung and said in their favor, are not so good for social uses as those of a size smaller and less pretentious. Anything that can be called an Orb is helpless in the minor and constantly recurring demands of feeling and intellect. Such eyes are great, no doubt, at the passions. They are the only eyes that can roll. They are terrible in frowns, and engaging in moments of softness and languor; a tear from them is a subject for Guido; but they are not the eyes to assist a good story with a genial twinkle, or to look you through and through, or to make you feel the good that is in common things, or perhaps even to tempt your confidence. They are not habitually bright, nor ought they to be. For a large eye conspicuously bright is fierce, feverish and glazy. Clear every eye should be, clear and pure in every part; but there is no steely point of brilliant light in large full eyes. That we have to watch for in the narrow line of liquid color between lids that a smile draws together. Yet, if experience is in favor of a medium, and not without a ten-dresse for small eyes, if well set and happy in their coloring, the imagination needs size and "sumptuousness"—that magnificence which finds its throne in the eye of heroic form, with pure full lids, dark rich fringes, and lustrous but not piercing brightness. This was the eye divined by the youthful lover:

Love, if thy tresses are so dark,
 How dark those hidden eyes must be.

These were the eyes of gods of old, happy in their immortality, and careless of men.

One might expect that the eye, as the especial interpreter of the soul, would, of all our features, retain its nature unimpaired by time, but in fact the eye pales with age. It not only dims, but the color washes out, as it were. We do not notice this change, because it is only in harmony with the other cool grey tints which steal over depth and color; but we recognize the fact where we see the exception, and note the strange face—the token, where it is seen, of an exceptional vigor of mind or body.

THE "FEET" MANIA IN CHINA.

[An American, sojourning in Hongkong, gives the following interesting particulars in regard to small feet, and how they are manufactured in China:]

THERE are small-footed ladies at Hongkong who gain a very fair livelihood by exhibiting their pedal extremities to sea-captains and other curious Europeans, at a dollar a head; but, as so superficial an examination of this national peculiarity did not satisfy me, I had recourse to some of my good friends among the missionaries. By their aid I obtained that some poor Chinese woman should bring me a complete gamut of little girls from the missionary schools. Many of these female children probably owed their lives to the persuasion (aided by opportune donations of rice) of my missionary friend and his lady, but their influence had been powerless to prevent the torture of their feet. On the appointed day they were all seated in a row in my friend's library, and their feet, which I suspect had undergone a preparatory washing, were unbound by the mammas. The first was a child of two years old. Her penance had just commenced. When the bandage of blue cotton was taken off I found that the great toe had been left untouched, but the other four had been forced under the ball of the foot, and closely bound in that position. The child, therefore, walked upon the knuckle joints of her four toes. The toes were red and inflamed, and the ligature caused evident pain. In the next three children (all of ages advancing at small intervals) the preparation was only to the same extent, it was confined to the four toes; gradually, however, these four toes, ceding to the continual pressure, lost their articulations and their identity as limbs, and became amalgamated with the sole of the foot. In the eldest of the four the redness and inflammation had entirely disappeared, the foot was cool and painless and appeared as though the four toes had been cut off by a knife. The foot was now somewhat the shape of a trowel.

In the fifth girl I saw the commencement of the second operation—a torture under which sickly children frequently die. The sole of the foot was now curved into the shape of a bow, the great toe and the heel being brought together as near as possible. Take a jnube and double it till two points of the lozenge nearly meet, and you will see what I mean. This is done very gradually. The bandage is never slackened—month by month it is drawn tighter—the foot inflames and swells, but the tender mamma perseveres—as the bones and tendons accommodate themselves to the position constrained by the bandage, so it is drawn tighter. At last the ball of the natural foot fits into the hollow of the sole, the root of the toe is brought into contact with the heel. The foot is a shapeless lump. The instep is where the ankle was, and all that is left to go into the slipper and tread the ground is the ball of the great toe and heel. This is the small foot of a Chinese woman—a bit of toe and a bit of heel, and a mark, like a cicatrice left after a huge cat, running up between them. Two of the girls were yet suffering great pain, and their feet were hot and inflamed, but in the eldest the operation was complete. She had attained the position of a small-footed woman, and her feet were quite cool, had no corns, and were not tender to the touch. One of the mammas, influenced perhaps by a little liberality, in the article of rice money, intrusted me with a Chinese mystere de toilette. Sometimes, it seems, when a woman is expected to have to do hard work, her toe and heel are not drawn so tightly together as to produce the true "small foot." To disguise this imperfection on her marriage-day, she has recourse to art. A piece of cork, shaped like an inverted sugar-loaf, is strapped on to her foot, and the small part goes into the slipper and passed for her foot. Thus are we poor men deceived!

ALAMEDA PARK HOTEL.

This new and elegant House will be opened for the reception of guests, on SATURDAY, the 18th instant. It is situated on the Alameda Encinal, within three minutes' walk of the San Leandro Railway, and three miles from the end of the wharf, between which and the foot of Broadway, steamers ply at frequent intervals during the day. The hotel can be reached by boat and rail, in forty minutes from Montgomery street. The location is in the midst of a dense grove, and, as a suburban resort, cannot be surpassed for beauty and healthfulness.

This hotel is splendidly fitted up with all the modern improvements, and in every respect will be conducted as a first class public house.

The proprietor would call especial attention of families to the attractiveness of this locality, so accessible, and yet retired, and free from the turmoil of the city.

Bowling Alleys, Billiard rooms, and all of the leading journals of the day will be at the disposal of visitors, while the sportsman can find an abundance of wild game in the vicinity of the hotel.

By a strict attention to business the proprietor hopes to merit the public patronage.

IN THE DISTRICT COURT OF THE

Twelfth Judicial District of the State of California, in and for the City and County of San Francisco
JOHN HOWARD, Plaintiff; vs. MARY HOWARD, Defendant - Action brought in the District Court of the Twelfth Judicial District of the State of California, in and for the City and County of San Francisco, and the Complaint filed in said City and County of San Francisco, in the office of the Clerk of said District Court.

The People of the State of California send greeting to MARY HOWARD, Defendant: - You are hereby required to appear in an action brought against you by the above named Plaintiff in the District Court of the Twelfth Judicial District of the State of California, in and for the City and County of San Francisco, and to answer the Complaint filed therein, (a copy of which accompanies this summons), within ten days, (exclusive of the day of service,) after the service on you of this Summons - if served within this County; or if served out of this County, but in this District, within Twenty Days; otherwise within Forty Days
- or judgment by default will be taken against you, according to the prayer of said Complaint.

The said action is brought to obtain a decree of this honorable Court dissolving the Bonds of Matrimony existing between Plaintiff and Defendant, and for general relief.

And you are hereby notified that if you fail to appear and answer the said complaint, as above required, the said plaintiff will apply to the Court for the relief therein demanded.

Given under my hand and Seal of the District Court of the Twelfth Judicial District of the State of California, in and for the City and County of San Francisco, this 21st day of April, in the year of our Lord, one thousand eight hundred and sixty-five.

A NEW INVENTION!

LEWIS'S

Self-Acting Wagon Brake!

By means of this invention, the wheels of a wagon are made to lock themselves when going down hill, certainly and effectively, and are released the moment there is any strain on the horses, without attention on the part of the driver.

It is already in use in many parts of the East, and has everywhere given satisfaction.

It will lock a wheel so that it CANNOT REVOLVE, the efforts of the wheel to turn making the lock tighter.

It operates in an instant, locking or unlocking as necessary.

It needs no care and requires no exertion.

It cannot fail to work, and is easier on the team than the common brake.

Simple in its construction, and costing no more than the common lock, it gives perfect security, and a child may drive the heaviest wagon over the steepest roads.

It can be used in the same way as the common hand or foot brake: A touch on the lever will effectually lock the wheels, and

RUNAWAYS ARE IMPOSSIBLE.

State, county or shop rights for sale.

cisco, or apply at Whitbeck's wagon factory, Market street

"We that have free souls, it touches us not."
HAMLET—Act III., Scene 2.

MR. FRANK PIXLEY has immortalized himself by his eloquent speech in the case of "The People vs. John Downes Wilson, Henry Johnson and Frederick Marriott." The opening is superb:

"Why should I argue this motion? that I may fill the gaping mouths of this crowd of spectators? or that I may see a vain effort in to-morrow's print?"

He evidently expected to make a substantial speech to "fill the gaping mouths" of the spectators. This is a beautiful expression, but is nothing compared to the magnificent simile he uses in his reply to the speech of Mr. Samuel Wilson:

"Marriott did not originate this thing; he was as innocent as was mother Eve, until the serpent upon his slimy belly crawled into the Garden of Eden to tempt the mother of mankind."

How gloriously does Mr. Pixley act as champion for his friend, even while forced to appear against him! "Innocent as was mother Eve!" Poor dear old man, of course he was! There he was lying in bed reading his Bible, no doubt—about mother Eve—when he saw a nasty, scaly, slimy serpent, (that is Downes Wilson,) crawling along on its abdomen. This horrible serpent, then, tempted this evangelically-innocent old gentleman, to suborn a Scotchman. Oh, was there no warning voice to whisper to him "scotch the snake instead of trying to corrupt the Scotchman!" Alas, no! Eve ate the fruit of the knowledge of good and evil. Marriott had been for a long, long time unaccustomed to any such diet.

THE reasoning powers displayed in the leading articles of the Call are extraordinary. The Call is small, but it has a big way of expressing its opinions. On Thursday it amused the public by advancing the idea that J. Wilkes Booth was assassinated, immediately after his commission of the crime, by his confederates. It says:

"In our opinion the man was a corpse in less than twelve hours after he committed the crime."

Its reason for this "opinion" is that because Booth, if captured, would be able to make revelations concerning his associates, they would probably kill him to prevent his doing so! The Call can find nothing in history to justify this absurd supposition. Just as there is said to be "honor among thieves," so there would be a certain honor among these murderers which would prevent them from taking the life of a man whose desperate deed had exalted him to the position of a hero in their estimation. It was unfortunate for the Call that, on the evening of the day on which this remarkable attempt at originality appeared in its columns, the assassin should have been overtaken and killed. This makes the concluding sentence appear very ridiculous:

"We think there is about as much chance of discovering perpetual motion as there is of finding and arresting J. Wilkes Booth."

We think the little Call will meet with fully as much success in attempting to discover the law of perpetual motion as in establishing a reputation for prophecy. When the Call attempts out of two ideas to educe a third, it generally fails most signally; it will be as well therefore for it to confine itself to its legitimate sphere of operations, and continue to "chronicle small beer."

It is said that Signor Giovanni Sbriglia's voice is brilliant in the extreme.

The assassin is dead. No opportunity was afforded him to make a melodramatic speech on the scaffold; to repulse with scorn all offers of mercy which might have made him on condition of his betraying his associates in crime; no chance to appear a hero even for a minute; chased into a barn at the extremity of a swamp he was shot down like a dog by the hand of a soldier. A fit ending. It was better that it should happen thus than that he should be conveyed loaded with chains to Washington, thrown into a dungeon, visited by newspaper scribblers who would duly record how he looked each day, whether his appetite was good, what remarks he made, and all the other interesting particulars which are so greedily sought after and devoured by the public. Before he could have been tried the feeling of loathing with which all now regard this paltry murderer of a great man, would have given away to an interested curiosity concerning him. It is better as it is, even if the newspapers are deprived of a valuable quantity of stock in trade. He shed the choicest blood in America; by the hand of one of America's citizen soldiers was his blood shed. Strange that the lightning did not flash over the wires the name of the "avenger of Lincoln," as he will be called.

THE Court of St. James appears to have adopted a more than Republican simplicity. The Owl, a London paper which picks up Court gossip, says the following are the exact words of the circular addressed by the master of the ceremonies to the various ambassadors and ministers accredited to the Court of St. James to inform them of her Majesty's intention of receiving them, with their wives, at Buckingham Palace. Only gentlemen were admitted at a similar Court last year:

"Lieut. General Sir Edward Cust presents his compliments to —, and has the honor to apprise him that her Majesty the Queen will be happy to receive the respects of the Diplomatic Body, Male and Female, at Buckingham Palace, Tuesday, 28th inst."

We hope none of the diplomatic men and women took offense at this style of address. It would rather startle the French Ambassador, we should imagine, to be invited to "bring the old woman along." This is really a change for the better; now the members of the aristocracy are simply classified as "male" and "female," class prejudices will speedily disappear.

RICHARD GITTINS and Evans Owens have brought suit against the Antelope Mining Company to recover $334 25 for work done. They say that their experience in the Antelope has been dear to them. Gittins and Owens declare that there's a good deal of difference between owing and getting, and though the money is certainly owing them getting it is quite another matter. Antelopes and deer seem continually appearing before our courts; scarcely a day passes without either a roe or a doe being involved in some legal difficulty. Neither John Doe nor Richard Roe, however, are connected with this Antelope case.

A GENTLEMAN.—A friend and old acquaintance of Secretary Seward—who honored the Flag with a friendly call, a few nights ago, will confer a favor by calling again, for reasons which will be explained to him.—Flag, April 28th.

This is a neat way of advertising the fact that one has some respectable acquaintances! "A friend and old acquaintance of Secretary Seward"! Mark that. Who dare say the Flag is not a respectable paper after all? Let the Alta take the hint and publish a notice at the top of its first column: "A bosom friend of President Johnson, who called at the Alta office and expressed his admiration of our leading articles, is requested to call again." By the way, we notice that one of the editors of the last-named paper has received a "private letter" from a Lieutenant Governor! Go in; there's nothing like advertising.

ENGLAND'S future king evidently takes much interest in encouraging art. In the Court Circular of March 9th, out of four items of intelligence concerning the doings of the young prince, three have reference to the fine arts:

"M. Desanges had the honor of a sitting for his portrait of the Princess of Wales."

Mr. R. P. Spiers had the honor of submitting a series of architectural drawings to the Prince of Wales.

The Prince of Wales gave Mr. Weigall the last of a series of sittings for his portrait yesterday."

THE population of this State are turning their attention to agriculture more every year. During the mining excitement last year a vast amount of capital was diverted from farming enterprises; but the farmer has again put his hand to the plough, has got rid of his shares in the Suckeminandleeceem Gold Mining Company and is now convinced that he can slowly but surely turn gold out of the soil by placing his dependence on plough shares.

It seems to be generally conceded that there are many points of resemblance between President Andrew Johnson and President Andrew Jackson. For our own part we don't believe there is any more difference between them than there is between John and Jack."

THE Gold Hill News says that a lady in Virginia, next door to the Union office, neglected to drape her house in appropriate mourning and, "On Wednesday night some 'Abolitionists' procured a bucket of ink, and while Mrs. W., H., or some other lady, was clasped in the arms of sleep—dreaming, perhaps—in a state of ink-ecstasy with vile intent, did they then and there, bespatter, splash, dab and blacken the lady's front, and which bears upon its boards the foul and blackening stains." This "Mrs. W., H., or some other lady," when she rose in the morning exclaimed, perhaps:

"'Tis not alone my inky cloak,
Nor customary suits of solemn black
That can denote me truly."

There was no inquest made into the matter, but it was suspected by the Union people that the "devil" had been round.

THE winds from the East, which formerly came to us freighted with the booming roar of the death-dealing cannon, now brings sweet notes of peace. Soon may it come! What harm if we demand—

"What ruh or what impediment there is,
What that the naked, poor and mangled peace,
Dear nurse of arts, plenties and joyful births
Should not, in this best garden of the world,
Fertile Columbia, raise her joyful visage."

"HATCHING treason is a foul crime." Of course it is, but any respectable fowl would have been ashamed to attempt to hatch such an addled egg as the Rebellion. The South got hold of a bad egg; the "yoke" of the North was what they said troubled them, and in trying to get rid of it they destroyed a considerable portion of the white element.

THE MAIN DRAINAGE WORKS.—We understand his Royal Highness the Prince of Wales has accepted the invitation of the Metropolitan Board to open the Main Drainage Works, and that Tuesday, the 4th of April, is appointed for that important ceremony.—London Standard.

What a nice condescending young man Albert is, to be sure. He isn't too proud to "take a drain" with the Board of Works men when they ask him.

How hard it is for a rich man to save his soul! If Jefferson Davis does not take care he will find that his riches will be apt to stand in his way in saving his life. He is travelling south as fast as thirteen millions in specie, loaded in wagons, will allow him to progress. We should advise Mr. Davis not to "wait for the wagon."

THE pail-factory of Armes & Dallam, on Sacramento street, caught fire on Thursday. No lives were lost. The report that Mr. Armes had "kicked the bucket" is untrue; he only turned a little pale when he saw his property burning, which perhaps might have given rise to the rumor.

A PIECE called Heron, the Highwayman, is being played in the East. This seems a profanation of the name of Heron. However, when the "world-renowned" ascended Mount Davidson the other day, it would scarcely have seemed improper to call her "Heron the high-way woman."

THE musical critic of the Alta is evidently a believer in breed. He tells us that Signor Muzio is a nephew of Verdi. "Breed," after all, is not the right word; "strain" is used by bird fanciers when speaking of birds; so really a good strain is a matter of importance in a singing-bird.

THE Board convened to inquire into the character of the infelix Felix O'Byrne, has at length concluded its labors. Whether after the weeks it has devoted to a microscopical examination, it has been able to discover sufficient to reward it for its labors, is doubtful.

MONITORS are no doubt well calculated to resist shot, but when they are once boarded they must surrender, as was proved, a couple of weeks ago, by the rapid manner in which a Monitor was "subjugated."

MR. PIXLEY, in his wonderful speech in the subordination case, said Marriott was "almost at death's door" when Johnson went to him. The fact is, Marriott was at Death's door, and Death would not let him in; he told him, however, that he might leave his paper. TREM.

Fanny Elssler, the famous danseuse, who some twenty-five years ago turned the heads of our citizens as she turned her heels at the various theatres, "still lives," and was present lately at the "Concordia Ball," in Vienna, in January, which was attended by all gentlemen of the aristocracy and bureaucracy, and the elite of artists. Mme. Fanny Elssler, appeared in a white satin dress and train, literally covered with diamonds, rubies and emeralds.

UN-SEEN SPIRITS.

THE shadows lay along Broadway,
'Twas near the twilight-tide—
And slowly there a lady fair
Was walking in her pride.
Alone walked she; but, viewlessly,
Walked spirits at her side.

Peace charmed the street beneath her feet,
And Honor charmed the air;
And all astir looked kind on her,
And culled her good as fair—
For all God ever gave to her,
She kept with chary cure.

She kept with care her beauties rare
From lovers warm and true—
For her heart was cold to all but gold,
And the rich came not to woo—
But honor'd well are charms to sell
If priests the selling do.

Now walking there was one more fair—
A slight girl, lily-pale;
And she had unseen company
To make the spirit quail—
'Twixt Want and Scorn she walk'd forlorn,
And nothing could avail.

No mercy now can clear her brow
For this world's peace to pray;
For, as love's wild prayer dissolved in air,
Her woman's heart gave way!—
But the sin forgiven by Christ in heaven
By man is cursed away!

[N. P. Willis.]

THE COLONEL AND THE WIDOW.

[A REMARKABLE episode of the great Peninsular War, which tells how Madam Nunez, a young and sprightly widow, contrived, in conjunction with her lover, Colonel Van Halen, to deceive two distinguished French generals, bring about their unconditional surrender, together with three thousand veteran soldiers, and frustrate the tactics of no less a personage than Marshal Suchet, Duke of Albufera, presents a striking illustration of the strange agencies by which military success or defeat is sometimes determined.]

EARLY in 1814, Marshal Soult, Duke of Dalmatia, and commander-in-chief of the French armies in Spain, after as valiantly as vainly attempting to arrest the victorious march of Wellington upon the "sacred soil" of France, was fain to accept the alternative of concentrating the débris of the broken imperial armies, in the hope, if not with the expectation, that, with their feet upon the so-called sacred soil, the fainting courage of his soldiers would sufficiently revive to enable him to oppose an effective resistance to the deliverer of the Peninsula.

To that end he had directed Marshal Suchet—commanding in Catalonia, and celebrated for the wanton destruction of Tarragona and wholesale massacre of its unarmed inhabitants, if not for much else, upon a grand, imperial scale—to withdraw the garrisons of Lerida, Tortosa, Meguinenza, Manzan, and, combining them with the large French force in Barcelona, to effect his junction with him, (Soult,) by a specified time and by a specified route.

The hurried flight of the French armies afforded Col. Van Halen, a Spauiard of Flemish descent, an opportunity he had passionately longed for since the unwilling conviction had been forced upon him that the days of French domination in Spain were not only numbered, but restricted to a brief and swiftly-narrowing span. Van Halen had been an ultra-Afrancesado, which means that, blinded by the dazzle of an unexampled success, he firmly believed that Napoleon was immovably seated, far out of fortune's shot upon that Olympus' height which his marvellous military genius and pitiless ambition had enabled him to attain. Believing thus, Van Halen had not for a moment hesitated to range himself on the side of the intrusive King Joseph, nothing doubting that that must be the winning side—the sole consideration which in the slightest degree influenced him. Time, the great teacher, proved that treason to Spain had been a terribly impolitic move. Van Halen found that, unfortunately for himself, he had beheld only the brazen front and iron hands of the colossal conqueror, not seeing or suspecting the feet of clay till the imperial robe was rent, asunder by the sword of Wellington.

The Colonel's position, thus sharply defined by inexorable fact, was an extremely unpleasant one. An Afrancesado, he too well knew, was regarded by his countrymen with even a fiercer hatred than a Frenchman proper; and should he fall into their hands in the day of vengeful triumph, his fate would not be for one moment doubtful. Should he escape that terrible hazard, the prospect of being trundled out of Spain with the fleeing armies was a dismal one, involving, as it necessarily did, the loss of rank and pay, as well as forfeiture of a very considerable inheritance, to which he would otherwise succeed at the death of an aged relative.

"Still," remarks M. Quiros, in his Sketches of the Catalonian Campaign, "still, though the grand game had for him taken a pestilent turn, Van Halen, being a man of ingenuity and courage, did not despair of rising a considerable winner from the table, whatever might befall the great players. He held promising cards. He was not only on Suchet's staff, but was implicitly confided in by the marshal, to whom he had been warmly commended by the Duc de Feltrey, Napoleon's military secretary for the affairs of Spain, and by King Joseph himself, to whose Court the handsome, accomplished Colonel had at one time been attached. In fact, Suchet concealed nothing from him except his cipher; and this simply because it was a regulation de rigueur in the French service, that the key to the cipher should on no pretence whatever be made known, except to such officers as a marshal or general might have to hold communication with by letter. Suchet violated the spirit, though not the letter of the prohibition, by disclosing to Van Halen a device he had adopted of making it doubly, trebly sure to his lieutenants that the presented message was genuine. This was to place in the letter a small piece of light-colored hair, which, the paper being opened by any one unaware of the trick, would fall unobserved to the ground—whilst its absence would, to the initiated French officer addressed, be conclusive that the cipher-letter was a forgery. It is clear, therefore, that should an opportunity occur of expiating his treason towards Spain by a striking, fruitful treason against France, Van Halen possessed peculiar facilities for availing himself of such a chance, and would not be at a loss for means of adding to those facilities.

"The supreme difficulty," continues Señor Quiros, "attendant upon delicate enterprises requiring an accomplice, and in which one false step, the slightest indiscretion, consigns the traitor to swift destruction, is to find a thoroughly reliable as well as astute ally. In that respect Van Halen was extremely fortunate. Francesca Nunez—a pretty, clever, audacious young widow, upon whom the Cestus of Venus hung but loosely—was devoted to the irresistible Colonel, whilst her hatred of the French was as genuinely Basque as she was herself."

Thus, then, it stood with Van Halen, when Marshal Soult's order was received at Barcelona, and Suchet, though with some reluctance, commenced the necessary dispositions for carrying it into effect. Fortunately for the success of Van Halen's scheme, the rough outline of which had for some time zigzagged, paled and brightened in his excited brain, the Duke of San Carlos passed the French outposts immediately after the command to evacuate Catalonia reached moody, discontented Suchet. The Duke assumed to have the power, in conjunction with others, of negotiating an armistice. Suchet, between whom and Soult there was no very friendly feeling, eagerly welcomed the proposal, and, to carry it into effect, left Barcelona with the Duke San Carlos, stating that he would probably be absent a week.

This was Van Halen's opportunity, and he seized it with the spring and clutch of a tiger. A few hours sufficed him to thoroughly elaborate his scheme, with the assisting counsel of Francesca Nunez, whose ardent zeal was kindled to flame by a Biscayau hatred of the French, and her passion for Van Halen—a marriage with whom was the promised guerdon of success.

The few pieces on the military chess-board with which the conspirators proposed to play their terribly hazardous game were placed as follows: Gen. Isidore Lamarque commanded immediately at Lerida, and officers subordinate to him at Tortosa, Meguiza and Manzan, the garrisons amounting in the aggregate to three thousand seasoned soldiers. These places were observed, not invested, by irregular corps, commanded by D'Erolles and Campans, which, though more numerous than the French, were hopelessly unequal to cope with them in the field.

However, that did not greatly signify, as the Anglo-Sicilian corps, commanded by Sir William Clinton, after having repaired Tarragona, was approaching Barcelona, in which city, however, were over twelve thousand French soldiers d'élite, buckled by the ramparts and cannon of Fort Monjuich.

This formidable Barcelona garrison did not figure in the programme arranged by Van Halen, whose clever game was to induce the troops under Isidore Lamarque, by means of forged directions, purporting to be written by Suchet, to abandon the strong places held by them at a given time, and march in a precisely-indicated direction, at a point in which they would join Suchet and the Barcelona garrison. The ciphers would, moreover, uprise Lamarque that, by a convention concluded between Suchet and the Spanish and English commanders, no attack would be made upon the French retiring forces, provided they left their field artillery behind; should the French generals fall into the snare, they and their troops once well entangled in the mountains, their surrender at discretion would be a matter of course, as well as Van Halen's reconciliation with his countrymen, and the important consequences to himself thereto attached.

Obviously the first thing to be done was to obtain Suchet's cipher, which little matter was easily settled by breaking open the marshal's écritoire. The letters were then prepared—the small pieces of light hair not being forgotten—placed each in a quill, and confided to Madam Francesca Nunez. She was also to be the bearer of verbal, but in the phraseology used, thoroughly well-authenticated advices to the Spanish generals, who were moreover requested to place themselves in communication with Sir William Clinton, in order to obtain his counsel and concurrence.

Thus furnished, the fair and fragile Francesca set gaily forth upon her mission, and successfully accomplished it. Upon the arrival of Colonel Van Halen at Tortosa or Lerida with Suchet's latest instructions, the march of the French troops would forthwith commence. One circumstance the wily widow could not report, not being cognizant thereof. Sir William Clinton, upon being consulted, indignantly refused to mix himself up with the affair. He waged honest war—not one carried on by means of forged letters. Still, though he would have nothing to do with the plot, he would cross the Llobregat with four or five regiments; and if a French force presented itself within his reach, as it probably would if the calculations of the Spanish generals were not falsified by the event, he should certainly attack that French force, as he would be in duty bound to do, by whatever scheme or chance the enemy might have been lured into such a position.

Of course this was all D'Erolles and Campans required. They, with Van Halen and the widow, could manage the plot better without than with Sir William; and since he, if necessary, would do the fighting part of the business, the arrangement was perfect.

The widow having done her part, it behoved Colonel Van Halen to boldly enter upon his role in the tragi-comedy. He was not a man to fail himself at such a crisis, and accompanied by an escort of some dozen cuirassiers, he took the road to Tortosa on the morning of the 13th of February, 1814. An ambush, as previously concerted by Campans and Francesca Nunez, encountered him in the first mountain gorge he and his escort entered. The cuirassiers were slain; and with six Spanish horsemen, clothed in the uniforms of the betrayed Frenchmen, Van Halen pushed vigorously onwards. He reached Tortosa safely, and sent in a message to the commandant requesting to know precisely when he would be ready to march. General Robert, it seems, had, for some cause or other, become suspicious of the genuineness of Suchet'smissive, and his reply was a request that Colonel Van Halen would enter the place and confer with him, General Robert. Van Halen declined the polite invitation, alleging that he was bound to see General Lamarque at Lerida without delay; and he at once rode off with his followers. "The fact," remarks Suchet in his Memoirs, "that Van Halen would not trust himself in Tortosa ought to have convinced General Robert of his treason."

Finally, Colonel Van Halen succeeded in convincing Lamarque that it was his duty to obey Marshal Suchet's peremptory order, however opposed to his own judgment the prescribed role might be. The French columns marched early on the morning of the 15th, closely followed, as arranged, by D'Erolles' and Campans' military rabblement, and bearing off with them a rich military chest. Lamarque had, moreover, positively refused to abandon the artillery to the Spaniards. At dead of the first night of the march, a chef de bataillon of the 42nd regiment awoke General Lamarque to tell him they were betrayed.

"Rest assured," he said—"rest assured that we are betrayed, and shall soon find ourselves in presence of quite 'other soldiers' than the Spanish canaille swarming about us. We may yet quietly effect our escape whilst the Spaniards are asleep and scattered about the place. Let us leave behind our artillery and baggage. We can gently awake the soldiers, and make the best of our way to the mountains in the direction of Vich and the frontiers of France. Our regiment knows the country well, and when we shall have had a five or six hours' start, nothing can any longer arrest our progress."

The chef de bataillon's warning voice was unheeded. The march of the French columns was resumed at daybreak; and whilst the sun was yet high in the heavens, the sheen of the English bayonets glittered in the distance, and a British mounted officer galloping up informed Lamarque that he could proceed no further. General Sir William Clinton, it was added, referred him for an explanation to the Spanish generals D'Erolles and Campans.

Resistance was out of the question, and the French surrendered to Campans; Sir William Clinton obstinately refusing to have anything to do with an affair which, but for him, might have had a very different termination. This was unfortunate, as, had he technically been a party to the terms of surrender agreed upon, he would have had a right to intervene in prevention of the scandalous violation of those terms by the Spaniards.

The success of the coup de traitre was complete, and General Campans, in a flaming order of the day, boasted that he had captured a French corps of three thousand men, including two general officers, twenty pieces of cannon, a vast quantity of baggage, and a rich military chest.

The loss to the French commander-in-chief was a heavy one at that juncture, particularly as Sir William Clinton and his allies, having no longer to observe Tortosa, Lerida, Meguinenza, Manzan, were enabled to effectually prevent Suchet from joining his chief.

Marshal Soult was in sore and pressing need, too, of such help as fifteen thousand soldiers d'élite might have rendered him, and at no time more so during his harassed retreat upon France than about a fortnight after Lamarque's surrender, when hotly pressed by Wellington, he was marching through the sandy plain of Ger, covering and masking his movements by a numerous rear guard. One corps was posted on a hill thickly covered with trees, the end of which abutted on a high road.

It was of the utmost importance that the English general should ascertain what force was on the other side in his immediate front. All who attempted to ascertain that fact were killed or driven back by the fire of skirmishers. At last Captain William Light dashed forward, as if he would force his way through the tirailleurs, but had hardly reached the wood when he was seen to drop the reins, and fall back in his saddle badly wounded, and scarcely able to sustain himself, his horse continuing to gallop onward. The skirmishers, believing him to be mortally hit, ceased firing, and in the position described the daring soldier rode along the front of the French infantry on the other side, counting them as he passed. That done, Captain Light sprang upright in his saddle, grasped the reins, and, spurring his horse to his fullest speed, galloped, without being touched by their hasty fire, past the skirmishers, who thought they had killed him, and riding up to Wellington exclaimed, "My lord, there are but five battalions on the other side of the hill." The wood was consequently at once forced, and Soult received the blow at Tarbes, which he might else have avoided. But for Van Halen and the widow, it is quite clear that Captain Light might have had to report that there were thirty instead of five battalions on the other side of the hill.

Colonel Van Halen, thoroughly reconciled—indeed, a sort of hero with his countrymen—was not long afterwards raised to the grade of general. We do not find it stated that he fulfilled his promise of marrying the widow; and, in the absence of positive information, we strongly incline to believe he did not.

MODERN DEMONOLOGY.

[In an article under the above title, Blackwood gives the following rap at Mr. Hume, the American Spiritualist:]

TABLES not only danced and expanded their mahogany claws after the fashion of the feline tribe, but soared into the air. Mr. Home also became preternaturally gassy. He began to float about the room, after the lights had been put out, with the ease and precision of a Leopard, and the astonished spectators dimly descried his figure horizontally extended beneath the ceiling, like a stuffed alligator suspended in an apothecary's shop. The mode of operation, as described by an eye-witness, was rather peculiar:

"Mr. Home was seated next the window. Through the semi-darkness his head was dimly visible against the curtains, and his hands might be seen in a faint white heap before him. Presently he said in a quiet voice, 'My chair is moving—I'm off the ground—don't notice me—talk of something else,' or words to that effect. It was very difficult to restrain the curiosity, not unmixed with a more serious feeling, which these few words awakened; but we talked, incoherently enough, upon some indifferent topic. I was sitting nearly opposite to Mr. Home, and I saw his hands disappear from the table, and his head vanish into the deep shadow beyond. In a moment or two more he spoke again. This time his voice was in the air above our heads. He had risen from his chair to a height of four or five feet from the ground. As he ascended higher he described his position as at first perpendicular and afterwards horizontal. He said he felt as if he had been turned in the gentlest manner, as a child is turned in the arms of a nurse. In a moment or two he told us he was going to pass across the window, against the grey silvery light of which he would be visible. We watched in profound silence, and saw his figure pass from one side of the window to the other, feet foremost, lying horizontally in the air. He spoke to us as he passed, and told us that he would turn the reverse way and recross the window, which he did. His own tranquil confidence in the safety of what seemed from below a situation of the most novel peril, gave confidence to everybody else; but with the strongest nerves it was impossible not to be conscious of a certain sensation of fear or awe. He hovered around the circle for several minutes, and passed, this time perpendicularly, over our heads. I heard his voice behind me in the air, and felt something brush my chair. It was his foot, which he gave me leave to touch. Turning to the spot where it was on the top of a chair, I placed my hand gently upon it, when he uttered a cry of pain, and the foot was withdrawn quickly with a palpable shudder. It was evidently not resting on the chair, but floating, and it sprang from the touch as a bird would. He now passed over to the furthest extremity of the room, and we could judge by his voice of the altitude and distance he had attained. He had reached the ceiling, upon which he made a slight mark, and soon afterwards descended and resumed his place at the table. An incident which occurred during the aerial passage, and imparted a strange solemnity to it, was that the accordion, which we supposed to be on the ground under the window close to us, played a strain of wild pathos in the air from the most distant corner in the room."

At other seances, sprigs of geranium and verbena were liberally distributed by spiritual hands to the company. Mr. Home became a sort of Roman candle, emitting fiery balls; and on one occasion, a jocular spirit took the unjustifiable liberty of purloining a tumbler of brandy-and-water, which a thirsty believer was in the very act of imbibing.

In justice to the Davenportes, we ought to state that their supporters claim for them the possession of powers equally extraordinary. Dr. Nichols gives the following narrative of phenomena which were observed at Buffalo:

"The room was not darkened, only obscured to a pleasant twilight. After several of the usual phenomena were exhibited, the two boys were raised from their chairs, carried across the room, and held up with their heads downwards before a window. 'We distinctly saw,' says an eye witness, (Query—Rand?) 'two gigantic hands attached to about three-fifths of a monstrous arm; and those hands grasped the ankles of the two boys, and thus held the lads, heels up and heads downward, before the window; now raising, now lowering them, till their heads bade fair to make acquaintance with the carpet on the floor! This curious, but assuredly not dignified, exhibition was several times repeated, and was plainly seen by every person present. Among these persons was an eminent physician, Dr. Blanchard, then of Buffalo, now of Chicago, Illinois, who was sitting on a chair by the side of Elizabeth Davenport; and all present saw an immense arm, attached to no apparent body—growing, as it were, out of space—glide along near the floor, till it reached around Dr. Blanchard's chair, when the hand grasped the lower back round of Elizabeth's chair, raised it from the floor with the child upon it, balanced it, and then raised it to the ceiling. The chair and child remained in the air, without contact with any person or thing, for a space of time estimated to be a minute, and then descended gradually to the place it first occupied."

We fear that Mr. Home, who, by his own account, has moved in the very highest circles of European society, and been received with marked distinction at more than one Imperial Court, may be shocked at finding his spiritual exhibitions classed in the same category with the more robust demonstrations of the Davenportes. There are ranks and grades even among magicians. Arabes, the Egyptian, viewed with scorn the infernal concoctions of the witch of Vesuvius. Bacon regarded Bungay as a mountebank, and hated him with an intensity which only a conjuror could feel. Richard Graham, who, in the reign of King James, was "worried and burnt at the Cross of Edinburgh," as a "notour and known necromancer, and common abuser of the people," had for some years been noted as a prominent licentiate of the devil's medical college. He confessed to be familiar with spirits, but regarded common witchcraft as a mean and despicable thing, and would hold no communication with the Bessie Dunlops and Eupham MacLeans of the day. But we cannot afford to recognize any such nice distinctions. The miracles of the Davenportes and of Mr. Home are substantially the same; and if it can be shown that the one are mere feats of jugglery and legerdemain, the credit of the other is overthrown.

A LONDON FOG.

MOST of our readers, we have no doubt, will have heard of that famous but foul congregation of vapors, called a London Fog, which, when it chooses to appear, casts a pall of thickest darkness over the Great Metropolis, changing day into night, and mystifying and confounding the myriads of human beings that dwell therein. This phenomenon, however, does not present itself every day, or even every year; it arrives only during certain states of the weather, and chiefly in winter, when the wind brings up the cold thick vapors from the German Ocean, and mingles them with the smoke of the metropolis. When the fog hangs over the streets to only a partial extent, there is produced a peculiar opacity in the air overhead, which is humorously but correctly defined as a "peas-soup atmosphere," from its resemblance to that dull yellow liquid. But when the fog arrives in all its force and substantiality, the atmosphere is beyond peas-soup pitch; and it is so dense and murky, that it may almost be felt and handled; and passengers on the streets can no more see through it than could fishes see through perfectly muddy water.

On the 23d of December 1818, London was enveloped in a fog, the most dense that had been witnessed for several years. The thickness of the vapor in the early part of the day was not so very great as to be attended with extraordinary inconvenience; but the opacity gradually increased, and in the city, where the fog is always the most dense, there was, about four o'clock, no possibility of discerning an object at the distance of a few paces. The carriages and wagons moving along the streets were not discoverable from the flag-ways, and the passengers on the latter derived very little aid from the lights in the windows, or from the lamps, as most of the shops, from fear of accidents, were shut, and the lamps afforded but a very feeble twinkling light, not visible until a near approach. The coachmen alighted from their boxes to lead their horses, and the link-boys were in great numbers to offer their assistance; but with every possible care and precaution, the passengers, both on foot and in carriages, seldom succeeded in making their way without mistakes—and horses and carriages frequently deviated from the streets to the flag-ways, to the imminent danger of the foot-passengers.

The noises made by the people in the streets were frightful—some shrieking from terror when surprised by the sudden approach of a horse or a carriage; others calling out to their fellow-travellers to warn them of danger, or anxiously inquiring their way; and many whistling and singing to make known that they were approaching. In a number of cases, the company deserted their carriages, which remained stationary, the coachmen not knowing where they were. Various sums, from half-a-crown to ten shillings, were obtained by link-boys for conducting a carriage through a single street. Nor was the presence and influence of the dense accumulation of vapors felt only out of doors. In the theatres, the actors on the stage were barely visible to the audience; and even private houses, though closed, and well furnished with fires, were filled and darkened by this unwelcome visitant. Between eleven and twelve o'clock, however, the rattling of carriages which had regained the power of motion, indicated the departure of the fog, and by midnight the metropolis had nearly resumed the appearance usually presented by it at that hour. Many, many thousands, who had been surprised at a distance from home, were then able for the first time to make their way to their firesides, and rejoin their anxious and alarmed families.

The fog, while it lasted, afforded a golden opportunity to thieves and pickpockets, and of this they failed not to avail themselves. A most daring gang of thieves paraded Piccadilly, and committed extensive depredations on the public with impunity. About the hour of five o'clock, several ladies, who had hired a coach, alighted near the barracks at Knightsbridge, and in consequence of the intense fog, they employed a linkboy to light them as far as the Strand. While they were proceeding along near the Cannon Brewery, a dastardly fellow came up with a link blazing in his hand, and dashed it among the ladies, six in number, which threw them into the utmost confusion. The lighted stuff that was annexed to the link stuck to the ladies' dresses, and burned them very much. At this instant a great many persons came up, who attempted to save the females' dresses from burning, and cried shame at the fellow's wanton act. In the confusion, which was evidently created for the purpose of robbery, one of the ladies was deprived of a scarf, and several persons around also lost their property at the same moment. Various other depredations were committed about the same period, along Piccadilly and elsewhere. The different roads leading to Kensington, Hammersmith, and other suburbs, were rendered most dangerous by footpads. It was a benefit night for the coachmakers. A foreign gentleman driving through Temple Bar, met a broad-wheeled wagon on the city side, which, coming in contact with his chaise, dashed it to pieces. Almost every street presented a similar misfortune. Two of the mails, passing along the Strand about seven o'clock, ran against each other, and were both stopped at a shock by the locking of the wheels. The coachman was thrown from one of them by the concussion, but escaped, fortunately, with a few bruises. There were various cases, nevertheless, where the injury was of a more deplorable character. Several persons were run over by carriages and killed, in the attempt to cross streets.

These are but a few of the misfortunes attendant upon a London fog. The robberies in shops and houses were without number. Thieves would enter a place of business, ask for some article under pretence of purchasing it, and in an instant snatch up something and make off with it. If they once got into the fog, pursuit was out of the question.

A PERSON asking how it happened that many beautiful ladies took up with indifferent husbands, after many fine offers, was thus aptly answered by a mountain maiden. A friend of hers requested her to go into a canebrake and get him the handsomest reed. She must get it at once going through, without turning. She went, and coming out, brought him quite a mean reed. When he asked her was that the handsomest she saw? "Oh no," replied she. "I saw many finer ones as I went along, but kept on in hopes of one much better, until I got nearly through, and then I was obliged to take up with any one I could find—and got a crooked one at last."

An Irish patriot over in Mariposa says that Judge Burkhalter, the traitor, ought to have the latter part of his name about his own neck.

EVERGREENS—THE CYPRESS.

THE Cypress is the universal emblem of mourning, and is the funeral tree in the eastern world, from the Persian Gulf to the Caspian Sea. It is also dedicated to the dead from Mazanderan to Constantinople, as well as to the utmost bounds of China's fruitful shores. Lucan says:

"The mournful cypress rises round, Tapering from the burial ground."

The Cypress is a dark pyramidal evergreen, growing to a large size in a soil and location favorable to its development. Its proper birth-place is the Levant, particularly the island of Candia, where it grew in such profusion that the Romans, and after them, the Venetians, obtained a considerable revenue from its timber. From Candia it was first brought to Italy, where it is completely naturalized, and forms so prominent and acknowledged a feature in the sylva of that classic country that no Italian scene is perfect without it. Bearing in mind the associations connected with this tree, what mournful grace does it throw over the architectural remains of ancient Rome!

"Come and see
That cypress, hear the owl, and plod your way
O'er steps of broken thrones and temples.
Cypress and Ivy, weed and wall-flower grown
Matted and mass'd together, billocks heap'd
On what were chambers, arch-crushed, columns strown
In fragments, choked-up vaults and frescoes steep'd
In subterranean damps, where the owl peep'd,
Deeming it midnight."

The true cypress, as every one knows, is a tree of much classical celebrity. Ovid gives us a traditionary account of the mournful origin of the cypress tree, and we always find it devoted to mournful thoughts and sad solemnities.

Cyparissus, son of Telephus of Cea, was beloved by Apollo; having killed the favorite stag of his friend, he grieved, pined, and dying, was changed by Apollo into a cypress tree. It has always been considered the type of grief, and is generally accompanied by some mournful appellation. Virgil speaks of "—fun'ral cypress rising like a shroud."

Notwithstanding its gloomy character, however, Homer plants it near the cave of Calypso on account of its fragrance—

"Poplars and alders ever quivering, played,
And nodding cypress formed a fragrant shade."

Why the shaft of Cupid should have been made of this tree, as some writers report, it is difficult to determine; it might be because then, as now, "the course of true love never did run smooth." Its being consecrated to Pluto and Proserpine in those days of dark superstition causes no surprise. Perhaps Shakspeare thought of this when he makes the Earl of Suffolk, whilst invoking curses on his enemies, wish

"Their sweetest shade a grove of cypress trees."

Consistently with the notions of its character, the ancient Romans, on the death of any high-born individual, were wont to place a branch of cypress before the door of the bouse where the corpse lay previous to interment; boughs were also strewn on the bier and borne by the mourners to the grave. These usages are not altogether obsolete in our day, and in many eastern countries they are also continued. The Turks especially, plant this tree with other aromatics in their cemeteries, not only from respect to the dead, but to benefit the living, as the balsamic odor is supposed to purify the air. Hasselquist speaks of seeing cypresses of remarkable size and beauty adorning their burial grounds.

"And when we lay him in his grave,
Let the sad cypress o'er him wave."

There is scarcely any poet who does not write of it in mournful sadness. Spencer records it as "the cypress funeral." Miss Landon observes that

"A funeral train
Will in a cypress grove be found,"

And again:

"The moon is o'er a grove of cypress trees Weeping like mourners."

The author of Childe Harold, in one of his peculiar moods, thus inquires:

"Ah! why,
With cypress branches hast thou wreathed thy bowers?"

The wood of this classical tree is sourous, fragrant and of the most imperishable nature—in the latter respect surpassing that of the cedar itself. It is on record that the doors of St. Peter's at Rome were made of cypress wood and were found perfectly sound after the lapse of eleven hundred years, when at the command of Eusebius the Fourth they were superseded by gates of bronze. It shared with the cedar the honor of enclosing the bodies of the illustrious dead when Egypt and Athens were in their glory.

There is no evergreen more desirable or worthy of cultivation than the native varieties of California, of which the Lawson's cypress stands unrivalled for beauty of form and foliage

A NAVIGATOR UNDER DIFFICULTIES.

[The following amusing incident is an episode in Olmstead's Sea-Board Slave States, and is worthy of a distinct and separate existence.]

THERE'S a yarn I have heard from the Staten Island coasters, who run down to the capes of Virginia for oysters, which illustrates admirably how Virginia commerce would be "legitimately" carried on, that is, in the manner naturally resulting from her system.

Among the largest and luckiest of the Virginia merchant-marine, is the fine, fast-sailing, light-draft, putty-bottomed, packet-sloop, the Abstraction. The "old Ab" was formerly owned and commanded by Captain Jerry S., and was manned by one black boy, sixty years old, named Mopus, and commonly called Uncle Mopus. Mopus was a slave, and Captain Jerry had bought him with the sloop.

Mopus was a proper slave, patient, meek, stupid, and stubborn—a talking donkey. He never had been taught to read or to comprehend figures. He could not understand the dial, and the binnacle-compass was a sort of fetish to him; the mystery of which he was too humble to desire to penetrate. He piously left these great things in the hands of his owner, and resigned himself to the will of that Providence which had given him a master to take care of him, who was responsible for his safety and profits, as well as the sloop's.

This resignation and faith of the good Mopus, however, often gave Captain Jerry a deal of trouble, for it obliged him to be nearly-always on deck and wide awake, and he sometimes thought he might better sell Mopus, and buy a nigger that was not so good, (Captain Jerry, as I heard it, used to put in a word between so and good, and bear down on it,) but the danger that such a one would prove entirely reckless of all moral suggestions, as smart niggers are very apt to, and go and steal himself, prevented his doing so, and he tried to make the best of Mopus' muses, and to supply the necessary brain-power for the sloop from his own private skull.

One night, Captain Jerry having been up all the previous night, and having just worked the sloop out of Hampton roads, against wind and tide, and being quite overcome with fatigue, thought he might venture to trust Mopus with the helm for a few hours, the sloop's course now being due north, up Chesapeake bay, wind light and quartering, a clear sky and nothing in the way for fifty miles.

Mopus knew the North Star very well, as niggers generally do, and telling him to keep the bow-sprit pointing straight at it, and not to disturb him until he saw land to starboard, Captain Jerry put out the binnacle-light to save oil, and went below.

Captain Jerry had the habit, which small-craft men are apt to get, of consulting aloud with himself. No sooner had he closed the companion scuttle than Mopus, with bead to the stove pipe, heard—"Moon full'd Thursday—slack water at six—North Star—that'll do till daylight sartin—due North—Tangier island—not afore meridian—can't go wrong till arter daylight, no how—good snooze this time—go in—off boots."

Mopus was a capital belmsman; and for two hours, while the breeze held, he kept on a bee-line to the northward. Then it fell calm; and then there came little eatpaws from northwest, and Mopus, after giving a pull of the main-sheet, left the helm a minute to flatten the jib. While he was forward, a flaw from the northeast took him all aback. Belaying jib-sheet, he came aft, and put helm up to wear round. Just as he jibed, came another flaw from the southwest, and a pretty smart one. Mopus met it, trimmed close, and seeing it was going to be steady, left the helm again, and shoved down the centre board. Then he went to the hatchway and got his coat, after which he took a pull at the scuttle-butt, and struck a light for a smoke.

All this time "Old Abby," with her head southeast, was shaking like a nail-mill. Mopus finally bauld the jib up to port, till the mainsail filled, then took the helm again, and kept her rap full heading south, but running off to the westward, now and then, in search for the North Star, which, as he could not see it anywhere else, he thought for a long time must have got behind the mainsail.

He had smoked out two pipes before he found it, and then it was right over the stern, which at first struck him as a singular circumstance. There it was, "pointers and all;" he could not be mistaken. But how did it get there?

Mopus pondered over it for two pipes more, all the while giving her a good full and nothing off. He was at first inclined to treat it as a mystery; but when, about two o'clock, the moon rose, he grew bold, kuotted his eyebrows, clenched his teeth, took off his tarpaulin, and struck his reflective organs with his clenched fist.

At length the problem was solved, and his lips trembled and gathered inward and puckered back with that pleasure which niggers, in common with human beings, enjoy, when they are conscious of having acquitted themselves well of a trying and honorable responsibility. He immediately hauled the boom down close to the taffrail; he went forward, and belayed the jib to windward, lighted his pipe again, and kept a good lookout till, as day broke, he made land to starboard, just as he expected; land to starboard and—why didn't he see it before?—a light right ahead, and not very far ahead either.

"All right," thought Mopus, "daylight, humph! let an old nigger alone to find the way to the North;" and he let the jib draw away, went aft, took the helm and called the skipper.

The skipper turned out:

"Hallo, uncle, close hauled? Wind's come out o' norward, has it? Why, Mopus! why! what the devil—what light's that? Why, Mopus! why you—Where you been taking the sloop to now, you black rascal! here's the North Star over the stern!"

"Oh yes, massa, past de Norf Star an hour ago; all right, sar, here's de land right off here to inward. Made a fine run, sar. Oh! I kuows how to fotch 'em along, I does myself, ha! ha! ha! Takes old Mope arter all, don't it? ha! ha! ha!"

"Ye-es (through his teeth) mighty fine run! Old Point. by the blood of Poeahontas! just where I'd got her last night at sunset!—you ginnin' eatamount! Takes old Mope! You bloody old cuss! I'll sell you for a chaw of tobacco to the first white man that'll take you off my hands!"

PUNNING MOTTOES.

SOME of the mottoes of the peerage are remarkable as containing puns on the names of the families who have chosen them. Some of these plays on words are good, others detestably bad. The family motto of the Vernons is one of the best: "Ver non semper viret;" which may either be "Vernon always flourishes," or "Spring does not always flourish," in which latter truism, it must be allowed, there is little appropriateness, unless, indeed, we hold it as a warning to "make hay while the sun shines." Perhaps a better motto of these species is that which the noble family of Onslow have selected. This is "Festina lente," an old Latin proverb, signifying "on slow," or hasten slowly; an advice at once to progress, and a caution at the same time to beware of imprudent haste. The Scottish Barons Fairfax have a pithy quibble for their family motto; namely, "Fare fac," which, being translated, signifies "Speak, do," This is not very happy, as it has been generally held a better rule "faire sans dire," "to act without much talking," which is the motto of the Fox family. The motto of the Nevilles is another of these punning devices, and is a tolerable one on the whole. "Ne vile velis," "Incline to nothing base." Very similar is the motto of the Fanes Earles of Westmoreland, which runs thus, "Ne vile fano," "Bring nothing base to the fane," or temple. The ducal bouse of Cavendish has the words "Cavendo tutus," signifying "Save by caution," as its motto. All these are respectable quibbles enough in their way, but as much cannot be properly said for the succeeding ones. "Forte scutum salus ducum" is a piece of bad Latin, intended to express that a "strong shield is the safety of commanders," and embodying in its first syllables the name of Fortescue, of which family it is the motto. Another of the same kind is that of the noble Irish family of Maynard: "Manus justa nardus," "The just hand is a precious ointment." This is too obviously a manufacture for a purpose, and but for the pun involved, could have been taken by nobody as a motto. Worse rather than better is the device of the Barons Henniker, whose family name is Major. "Deus major columna," "God is the great support," are the words in question. With a little more skill, though at the cost of employing an obsolete Latin word, the family of Aston have contrived to get their name nearly hitched into a line of a decent kind as regards sense. Their motto is, "Numini et patrie asto," "I stand to God and my country." But the greatest degree of vanity, and the weakest invention exhibited in this way, occur in the case of the Temples, or at least the Buckingham branch of that family. "Templa quam dilecta," in English, "Temples, how beloved," is the sentence alluded to. The second meaning, or double entendre, is nothing else than "What an amiable family the Temples are!" From such armorial mottoes as these, it is a pleasure to turn to that now borne by the line of Bruce, once royal and yet noble. A single word form their dignified and pathetic motto, "Fuinus," "We have been." Volumes could not tell more emphatically the history of the house.

One of the most apt and perfect of all mottoes, was that suggested by Henry Erskine for the family arms of Gillespie, the founder of Gillespie's Hospital at Edinburgh, and who had made a fortune by dealing in snuff. The lines

Who could hae thought it,
That noses had bought it?

were those proposed by the witty lawyer, but Mr. Gillespie did not, we fear, adorn his carriage with them, though, for the credit of his sense, it is to be hoped he enjoyed their humor.

To Mr. Jonathan Hastings, of Cambridge, is ascribed the origin of the term Yankee, so offensive to Southern ears, in 1713. He used it to express excellence—as, a "Yankee good horse," or "Yankee good cider." The students of Harvard soon caught it and used it as a term of reproach.

KISSING.—Josh Billings says there is "one cold blue lean kiss that always makes him shiver to see. Tew persons (ov the femail perswashun) who hav witnessd a grate many yonger and more pulpy daze, meet in some publick plase and not haven saw each uthor for 24 hours tha kiss immediatly; tha tork about the wether and the yung man who preeched yesterday, and then tha kiss immediatly, and then tha blush and larf at what tha sa tew each other, and kiss again immediatly. This kind ov kissing alwas puts me in mind of tew old flints trieing tew strike fire."

THEATRICAL TALK.

AT Maguire's fair audiences have been in attendance nightly during the week to witness the farewell performances of Miss Heron. The best of her representations was "Gamea," the worst, "Julia," in the Hunchback. Miss Heron positively burlesques this character. Where she is so bad throughout it is scarcely worth while to particularize, but I must protest against the fearfully extravagant and absurd manner in which she acts while "Master Walter" is describing the tapestried hangings portraying the story of the page and the lady. "Julia," no doubt, should appear carried away by the story, but her interest is naturally evinced by the earnest gaze, the breathless anxiety with which she listens, as each word falls from "Master Walter's" lips, not by starting to her feet and pacing up and down the stage like an untamable hyena or other caged wild beast, and shrieking with all the power her lungs afford. "Julia" was not a maniac. Miss Heron was to have closed her engagement in the character in which she opened—"Camille"—which she appears to consider the Alpha and Omega of her professional fame. In consequence of indisposition, however, Miss Heron's engagement came to a sudden close on Wednesday night. To-night the sensation drama of Fraud and its Victims, founded on Reade's famous novel of Very Hard Cash, will be presented. On Monday the new drama of Sybilla; or, Step by Step, will be produced. On Thursday the celebrated American low comedian, Dan Setchell will appear in Ici on parle Francais and One Thousand Milliners Wanted. I trust the public will soon have the pleasure of seeing Dan Setchell in the character of "Captain Cuttle"; in this he is immense.

Mr. Charles Wheatleigh goes up to Virginia the beginning of next week to give the Virginians a taste of his quality. They may be assured that they have a treat in store for them.

The circus nightly presents the spectacle of a grand circle closely packed with human beings, all happy and amused. The dogs and monkeys cause immense fun; Olina is a miracle of muscularity; Barry's double somersault is always successfully performed; Cooke, the Shaksperian jester, is always original, and he lavishes jests with a prodigality which proves that there are lots more where those came from; the peerless Zoyara goes the giddy round at lightning speed, astonishing all by her (or his?) wonderful equitation, and all the members of this splendid company of equestrians, gymnasts, clowns and wondrously intelligent quadrupeds are so perfect in their respective parts that the most brilliant entertainment of the kind ever presented on this coast is the result. Every Wednesday and Saturday afternoon performances are given so as not to keep the little ones up after the time by which they ought to be in bed and asleep.

The American re-opened on Thursday with the burlesque of Flair Rosamond. To-night, and also at the afternoon performance, the grand spectacular play of The Elves will be produced. Next week, Fra Diavolo and the Invincibles, will be put on the stage. The company at this house which comprises the Worrell sisters, Mrs. Gass, Mrs. Franks, Messrs. Franks, Reeves, Hamilton, Torrence and "a host of supernumeraries," is admirably adapted to the production of burlesque, and having cut down the prices to 50 and 25 cents, will no doubt draw good houses.

An extremely neat little theatrical paper, called Figaro makes its appearance to day. It will be distributed gratuitously among the audiences at Maguire's Opera House and at the Academy of Music during the Opera season and Gottschalk's concerts. Its design is similar to the New York Play Bill.

TOUCHSTONE.

THEATRICALS AT THE EAST.—Edwin Booth was, at last mail advices, playing an engagement at the Boston Theatre with great success. Mr. Booth's engagement will be followed by Mrs. Bowers and Barney Williams. Mrs. Julia Pelby Thoma was at the Howard Athenæum. Miss Jennie Kempton, (late of the Richings Opera Troupe) was giving concerts at Chelsea, near Boston, assisted by the choir of the Church of Unity. Mr. and Mrs. Charles Kean had accepted an engagement for eleven nights at the Broadway Theatre. McKean Buchanan had a "set-to" with the critic of the Cincinnati Gazette, (who was not properly appreciative,) and was taken to the station house. Bonicault's new Irish drama, Arrah-Na-Pogue, is attracting the attention of all the New York managers, and his agent in that city is awaiting competition bids for it. Fisk's new military drama, Corporal Cartouche, was being played at the Winter Garden. New York, Harry Placide taking the leading part. The Sleeping Beauty was playing at the Olympic, Mrs. John Wood being the "Beauty." Emily Jordan and Frank Lawlor were to appear soon at the Troy Opera House. Mrs. Leighton and Yankee Locke had just concluded an engagement at Alexandria, (Va.) and were to go to Lexington, Ky.

A boy named Wm. H. Lovell, aged fifteen years, was killed in Sacramento, April 24th, by being dragged through the streets by a horse. The boy had been left by his father to hold the animal, and had fastened the rope to his person. The horse took fright, and all efforts to stop him failed. On Eleventh street, after being dragged a dozen or more blocks the lad became disconnected from rope, and was picked up and placed on the sidewalk; he was still breathing, but expired in a few minutes.

THE SHERMAN-JOHNSTON PEACE PROJECT.

WE publish, as among the most important events which have recently transpired, the terms of Johnston's surrender to Sherman (if that may be termed a "surrender," which examined by later and clearer light seems more like a strategic success). Had the terms been final and obligatory upon our Government, much of the hard fighting under Gen. Sherman would have been lost at the point of his pen. Following appropriately the statement of the agreement referred to, we place a despatch from Washington, reporting the proceedings of a Cabinet meeting which disapprove of the diplomatic efforts of the General, concluding the chapter with the reasons for such disapproval—reasons which will be regarded by every far-seeing and patriotic citizen as sound, logical and in every respect just:

BASIS OF AGREEMENT BETWEEN GEN. SHERMAN AND JOHNSTON.

Memorandum of basis of agreement, made this 18th day of April, 1865, near Durham's Station, North Carolina, by and between Gen. Jos. Johnston, commanding the Confederate Army, and Major-Gen. Sherman, commanding the Army of the United States in North Carolina—both present:

First, The contending armies now in the field are to maintain their status quo until notice is given by either commanding General that either army becomes an opponent. A reasonable time, say forty-eight hours, is allowed the Confederate armies now in existence to be disbanded and conducted to their several State Capitals, there to deposit their arms and public property in the State Arsenal, and each officer and man to execute and file an agreement to cease from all acts of war, and abide the action of both the State and Federal authorities. The number of arms to be reported to the Chief of Ordnance at Washington City, subject to the future action of the Congress of the United States, and in the meantime to be used solely to maintain peace and order within the borders of the States respectively.

Second, The recognition by the Executive of the United States of the several State Governments, and their officers and Legislatures, on their taking the oath prescribed by the Constitution of the United States, and where conflicting State Governments have resulted from the war the legitimacy of all shall be submitted to the Supreme Court of the United States.

Third, The re-establishment of all the Federal Courts of the several States, with their powers as defined by the Constitution and laws of Congress.

Fourth, The people and inhabitants of all the states are to be guaranteed, so far as the Executive can, their political rights and franchises, as well as their rights of person and property as defined by the Constitution of the United States and of the states respectively.

Fifth, The Executive authority of the Government of the United States is not to disturb any of the people by reason of the late war, so long as they live in peace and quiet and abstain from acts of armed hostility, and obey the laws in existence at the place of their residence.

Sixth, In general terms, to grant a general amnesty, so far as the Executive Power of the United States can command one, on condition of the disbandment of the Confederate armies and their distribution to their farms, and resumption of peaceful pursuits by the officers and men, as hitherto, composing the said armies.

Not being fully empowered by our respective principals to fulfil these terms, we individually and officially pledge ourselves promptly to obtain the necessary authority, and to carry out the above programme.

WM. T. SHERMAN,

Commanding the Army of the United States in North Carolina.

J. E. JOHNSTON,

General Commanding Confederate States Army in North Carolina.

ACTION OF THE PRESIDENT AND HIS ADVISERS UPON RECEIPT OF THE TERMS PROPOSED.

A Cabinet meeting was held at eight o'clock in the evening of the 22d inst., at which the action of Gen. Sherman was disapproved of by the President, Secretary of War, General Grant and by every member of the Cabinet. General Sherman was ordered to resume hostilities immediately, and was directed that the instructions given him by the late President, in the following telegram, which was penned by Mr. Lincoln himself, at the Capitol on the 3d of March, were approved by President Johnson, and were reiterated, to govern the action of military commanders. On the night of the 3d of March, while President Lincoln and his Cabinet were at the Capitol, a telegram from Gen. Grant was brought to the Secretary, informing him that Gen. Lee had requested an interview or conference to make arrangements for terms of peace. The letter of Lee was published in a letter from Davis to the rebel Congress. Gen. Grant's telegram was submitted to Mr. Lincoln, who, after pondering a few moments, took up his pen and wrote with his own hand the following reply, which he submitted to the Secretary of War and Secretary of State. It was then dated, addressed and signed by the Secretary of War, and telegraphed to Gen. Grant, as follows:

"Washington, March 3, 1865.—To Lieutenant Gen. Grant: The President directs me to say to you that he wishes you to have no conference with Gen. Lee unless it be for the capitulation of Lee's army, or on some minor and purely military matter. He instructs me to say that you are not to decide, discuss or confer upon any political question. Such questions the President holds in his own hands, and will submit them to no military conferences or conventions. In the meantime you are to press to the utmost your military advantages."
—STANTON.

PRESIDENT JOHNSON'S REASONS FOR REJECTING THE "NICE LITTLE ARRANGEMENT."

Washington, April 23d.—The proceedings of Gen. Sherman are unapproved for the following reasons:

First—It was an exercise of authority not vested in Gen. Sherman, and on its face shows that both he and Johnston knew that he (Sherman) had no authority to enter into any such arrangement.

Second—It was a practical acknowledgment of the rebel Government.

Third—It undertook to re-establish the rebel State Governments, which had been overthrown at the sacrifice of many thousands of loyal lives and treasure, and placed arms and munitions of war in the hands of rebels at their respective capitals, which might be used as soon as the armies of the United States are disbanded, and used to conquer and subdue loyal States.

Fourth—By the restoration of the rebel authorities, in their respective States, they would be enabled to re-establish slavery.

Fifth—It might furnish a ground for the responsibility of the Federal Government to pay the rebel debt, and certainly subjects loyal citizens of the rebel States to the debt contracted by the rebels in the name of the State.

Sixth—It put in dispute the existence of loyal State Governments, and the new State of Western Virginia, which had been recognized by every department of the United States Government.

Seventh—It practically abolished the confiscation laws, relieved the rebels of every degree, who slaughtered our people, from all pains and penalties for their crime.

Eighth—It gave terms that had been deliberately, repeatedly and solemnly rejected by President Lincoln, and better terms than the rebels had ever asked in their most prosperous condition.

Ninth—It formed no basis for a lasting peace, but relieved the rebels from the pressure of our victories, and left them in condition to renew their efforts to overthrow the United States Government and subdue the loyal States whenever their strength recruited and opportunity should offer.

ALFRED TENNYSON ON BULWER.

[It may be recollected that Bulwer in his New Timon took occasion to ventilate some very malignant and uncalled-for asperities against his brother author, Alfred Tennyson. They called forth a squib or two in Punch. It now appears that Tennyson himself entered the field in the latter journal with the following "settler:"]

THE NEW TIMON AND THE POETS.

WE know him out of Shakspeare's art,
And those fine curses which he spoke:
The old Timon with his noble heart,
That, strongly loathing, greatly broke.

So died the OLD: here comes the NEW.
Regard him: a familiar face:
I thought we knew him; what, it's you,
The padded man—that wears the stays!

Who killed the girls and thrilled the boys
With dandy pathos when you wrote,
A Lion you, that made a noise,
And shook a mane en papillotes.

And once you tried the mimes too;
You fail'd, sir: therefore now you turn;
You fall on those who are to you
As Captain is to Subaltern.

But men of long enduring hopes,
And careless what this hour may bring,
Can pardon little would-be Popes
And Brummels when they try to sting.

An artist, sir, should rest in Art,
And waive a little of his claim;
To have the deep poetic heart
Is more than all poetic fame.

But you, sir, you are hard to please;
You never look but half content:
Nor like a gentleman at ease,
With moral breadth of temperament.

And what with spites and what with fears,
You cannot let a body be:
It's always ringing in your ears,
"They call this man as good as me."

What profits now to understand
The merits of a spotless shirt.
A dapper boot—a little hand,
If half the little soul is dirt!

You talk of tinsel! why we see
The mark of rouge upon your cheeks;
You prate of Nature! you are he
That spilt his life about the cliques.

A TIMON you! Nay, nay, for shame:
It looks too arrogant a jest—
The fierce old man—to take his name.
You handbox. Off, and let him rest.

CHAPTER XXVI.

A CHILLING RECONCILIATION.

THAT unfortunate meeting on the stairs made a very deep impression upon Maude Tredethlyn. She had never before encountered drunkenness; and it was one of those sins which seemed to her to belong to a region of outer darkness, in which decent people had no place. Her father had always been as sober as an anchorite; her father's guests were gentlemen. She had heard, now and then, in the course of her life at the Cedars, of a drunken gardener dismissed with ignominy from the gardens—a drunken groom degraded from his rank in the stables. But Francis—her husband—that he should be thick of speech and nsteady of foot under the influence of strong drink!—it seemed almost too horrible for belief. She lay awake in the morning sunlight, thinking of Francis Tredethlyn's misdemeanor.

"And just as I fancied that I was beginning to love him!" she thought, regretfully. Would they meet at breakfast? she wondered. And if they did meet, what would Francis say to her? A sickly dread of that meeting took possession of her mind. If he apologized, how was she to answer him? Would it be possible for her to conceal her disgust?

"Let me remember his goodness to my father," she murmured. "Oh, can I ever be so base as to forget that?"

The possible meeting at the breakfast-table was very easily avoided. Mrs. Tredethlyn had a headache, and took her strong green tea and dry toast in the pretty little boudoir, with the pink draperies and Parian statuettes, the satin-wood cabinets and book-cases, the Persian carpets and polar bearskin rugs, the marqueterie jardinières and toy Swiss cottage birdcages, selected by Harcourt Lowther. It was rather an enervating little boudoir, eminently adapted for the perusal of French novels, and the neglect of all the duties of life. Mrs. Tredethlyn breakfasted in her boudoir, so there was no uncomfortable meeting between the husband and wife. Francis left the house before noon, in order to keep an appointment with his friend Mr. Lowther. They were going together to the Doncaster spring meeting, where Bohemianism would be rampant, and were to be away for some days. Poor Francis ran into the library, while his friend waited for him, and scribbled a hasty note to his wife, full of penitence and self-humiliation. He gave the missive to Mrs. Tredethlyn's maid at the foot of the stairs, while Harcourt was standing in a little room opening out of the hall, arranging the strap of a race-glass across his light overcoat. Mr. Tredethlyn went back to the library in search of a railway rug which he had flung off his arm when he sat down to write the letter, and during his brief absence there was a flutter of silk in the hall, and a little conference between Mr. Lowther and the abigail.

Half an hour afterwards, when the two men were walking up and down the platform at the King's Cross station, with cigars in their mouths, Mr. Lowther handed his friend the identical letter which Francis had entrusted to his wife's maid.

"You can post that to its address, if you like, dear boy; but I think I should light my cigar with it. The seal is unbroken, you see; but I fancy I can make a tolerable guess at the contents of the epistle. Dear old Frank, if you want to preserve the merest semblance of manhood, the poorest remnant of independence, never beg your wife's pardon."

Of course Mr. Tredethlyn was very angry. Harcourt Lowther was prepared to encounter a given amount of resistance. The wave may lash and beat itself against the quiet breast of the rock; and the rock, secure in its supremacy, has only to stand still until that poor worn-out wave crawls meekly to the stony bosom, a conquered and a placid thing. Mr. Lowther had his work to do, and he took his own time about doing it. The apologetic little epistle was not sent to Mrs. Tredethlyn; and at an uproarious after-dinner assemblage at the "Reindeer," Francis abandoned such frivolous stuff as sparkling Moselles and Burgundies for fierce libations of brandy punch. He made a tremendous book for all manner of events, always under the advice of his friend; indeed, its pages contained many rather heavy engagements with Mr. Lowther himself, who affected extreme simplicity amongst the magnates of the turf, but who was nevertheless eminently respected by those gentlemen, as being of the deep and dangerous class—a dark horse, secretly exercised on lonely commons at weird hours of the early morning, and winning with a rush when he was least expected to do so.

While Francis was seeing life through the medium provided for him by his experienced adviser, Maude enjoyed herself after her own fashion. She had been very happy at Twickenham, but she had never until now been entirely her own mistress, with unlimited credit and unlimited ready money, and all the privileges of a matron. At the Cedars she had been always more or less under her father's direction. She had acted very much as she pleased upon all occasions; but she had made a point of consulting him about the smallest step in her simple life; a round of calls, a day's shopping, a little musical gathering after a dinner-party, the amount of a subscription to a charity—even the color of a dress.

But now the young matron shook off even the gentle fetters which had held the girl, and spread her pinions for a bolder flight. A much wider world had opened itself to the merchant's daughter since her marriage. The story of Mr. Tredethlyn's fortune—always multiplied by the liberal tongue of rumor—was one of the most popular topics amongst the denizens of the new district in which Mr. Tredethlyn's house was situated. None of these West End people knew that Lionel Hillary's position had ever endured a dreadful crisis of uncertainty and terror. The marriage between Maude and Francis was supposed to be one of those sublime unions in which wealth is united to wealth—the alliance of a Miss Rothschild with a Master Lafitte—a grand commercial combination for the consolidation of capital.

So Maude took her place as one of the most important novelties of the current year. She gave great receptions in her three drawing-rooms, whose gorgeous decorations were just a little too much like the velvet and ormolu magnificence of a public room at a gigantic hotel. She organized dinner-parties and revised and corrected a menu with the savoir-faire of a Brillat Savarin in petticoats. Always accustomed to a reckless expenditure, she had no idea of the necessity for some regulation in the expenses of a large household. Left a great deal to herself, and frequently at a loss for occupation, she often spent her husband's money from sheer desire for amusement. After that unlucky encounter on the stairs she resigned herself entirely to her position as a fashionable wife. Her husband went his way unmolested, and she went hers. She was tolerably happy, for the life was a very pleasant one to live; but oh, what a vain, empty, profitless existence to look back upon!—the success of a dinner, the triumph of an audacious toilette, the only landmarks on a great flat of frivolity. But Mrs. Tredethlyn was not at the age in which people are given to looking back; she was rich, beautiful, accomplished, agreeable, with that dash of recklessness in her gaiety which makes a woman such an acquisition in a drawing-room, and the fumes of the incense which her admirers burned before her were just a little intoxicating. The Twickenham loungers, who had worshipped her mutely and reverently from afar off, found themselves distanced now by bolder adorers, and, conversing amongst themselves upon the staircases and on the outer edges of crowded drawing-rooms in the stuccoed district, shook their heads and pulled their whiskers, gravely opining that Mrs. Tredethlyn was "going the pace."

Maude had been Francis Tredethlyn's wife more than six months, and the London season was at its fullest height, when an accidental meeting with Julia Desmond brought about that young lady's restoration to her old position of Confidante and companion to the pampered daughter of her dead father's friend. The two women met in the Pantheon, and it was a terrible shock to Maude to see her old companion dawdling listlessly before a stall of toys, dressed in shabby black silk and a doubtful bonnet, and attended by two ungainly girls in short petticoats and scarlet stockings.

The proud spirit of the Desmonds had been crushed by the iron hand of necessity. In these perpetual duels between pride and poverty, the result seems only a question of time. Poverty must have the best of it, unless, indeed, death steps between the combatants to give poor pride a doubtful victory. Julia Desmond had carried her pride and anger away from the luxurious idleness of the Cedars, to nurse them in a London lodging. The only money she had in the world was a ten-pound note, left out of a sum which the liberal merchant had given her for the payment of a dressmaker's bill. She had the jewels given her by Francis Tredethlyn—the diamonds which she had thrown at his feet in the little study at the Cedars, on the night of the amateur theatricals—but which the sober reflections of the following morning had prompted her to retain amongst her possessions. She had these, and upon these she might have raised a very considerable sum of money. But the angry Julia had no desire to raise money. A life of idleness in a London lodging was the very last existence to suit her energetic nature. She inserted an advertisement in the Times upon the very day after her departure from Twickenham, and she went on advertising until she succeeded in getting a situation as governess in a gentleman's family. But ah! then came the bitterest of all her trials. She fancied that her life, wherever she went, would be more or less like the life at the Cedars. There would be a great deal more work, perhaps; there might be less luxury, less gaiety, but it would be the same kind of life; while on any day the lucky chance might arise, and the beauty of the Desmonds might win her some great prize in the matrimonial lottery.

Alas for Julia's inexperienced notions of a governess's existence! She found herself the drudge of an exacting mistress, with every hour of her dreary life mapped out and allotted for her, with less share in the social pleasures of the house she lived in than if she had been the kitchen-maid, and with two small tyrants in crinkled hair and holland pinafores always on the watch to detect her shortcomings, and to twist them into excuses for their own. The dreadful monotony of her life would alone have made it odious; but Julia had "a sorrow's crown of sorrow" perpetually pressing on her tortured brow. She had the recollection of happier things—the pleasant idleness at the Cedars, the position of Francis Tredethlyn's affianced wife. And she had given up this position in one moment of ungovernable rage and jealousy. She had suffered one mad impulse of her proud nature to undo the slow work of months. Miss Desmond had ample leisure for the contemplation of her folly during the long winter evenings which she spent in a third-floor sitting-room at Bayswater, hearing unwilling children grind hopelessly at a German grammar by the light of two guttering tallow candles. She did contemplate her folly, while the guttural verbs and declensions fell with a droning noise on her unlistening ears; but the rage which swelled her bosom was against Maude Hillary, and Maude alone.

She saw Maude's carriage in the park sometimes while she took her allotted walk with the unwilling children, who might have been pleasant children enough, perhaps, if they had not been weighed down by intellectual exercises compared to which the enforced physical labors of Toulon would have seemed light and agreeable. Julia saw her old companion, and her mind went back to the sunny afternoons on the lawn at Twickenham; and the sight of the pretty face and golden hair, the Skye terriers and neatly appointed equipage, stirred the fire of hatred always burning in her breast, until she could almost have shaken her small fist at the merchant's daughter.

She saw the announcement of Maude's marriage in the Times, and hated her still more. She saw Maude in the park, after her marriage, and in a more splendid equipage than the landau from the Cedars, and she hated her even more and more. She set her teeth together and drew back under the shadow of the trees to watch Francis Tredethlyn's wife drive by.

"She has cheated me out of it all," she thought; "it would all have been mine but for her treachery."

Then one bright sunny afternoon in early May the two women met—Julia, a wan shadow of her former self, worn out with hard work, depressed by the monotony of her life, indifferent as to her dress and appearance; Maude, a beaming creature in gauzy mauve muslin, with a Watteau skirt, all a-flutter with ribbons, and a voluminous train sweeping in the dust behind her.

"Dear Julia—"

"Maude—Mrs. Tredethlyn!"

Miss Desmond turned as pale as death. The encounter had come upon her very suddenly, and she was neither physically nor mentally able to bear it. She set her teeth and tried to flash the old defiance from her dark eyes. But the light of that once fiery glance died out like the flame of a candle which burns feebly in the glare of the morning sun. Julia was quite worn out by the life she had been leading for the last year and a half. The pride of a Somerset might give way beneath a long course of overwork and indifferent diet.

After that first exclamation of surprise she drew herself to her fullest height, and tried to pass Mrs. Tredethlyn with a bow, and a faint, cold smile of recognition, but Maude stopped her:

"Dearest Julia, if you knew how anxious and unhappy I have been about you, I'm sure you wouldn't want to pass me by. Do let us be friends. The past is forgotten, isn't it? Yes, I'm sure it is. Will you come up-stairs to the picture gallery? that's always a nice solitary place where one can talk. Are those young ladies with you? What very nice little girls! Miss Desmond and I are going up-stairs, dear, to have a chat. Will you come with us?"

The elder of Julia's pupils, to whom this question was addressed, replied only by a stony glare. She was petrified by the audacity of this smiling creature in mauve who dared to take possession of her governess. The youthful mind, soured by a long course of German declensions, is apt to contemplate everything in a gloomy aspect.

Maude and Julia went past poor Hayden's big cold picture, and made their way to a small room which was quite empty. Julia's face had a stern darkness upon it, which might have frightened any one less hopeful than Maude; but that young lady had been surrounded by an atmosphere of love from her cradle upwards, and was entirely unacquainted with the diagnosis of hatred. She despatched the children to look at the pictures in the larger rooms, and then laying her hand caressingly upon Miss Desmond's arm, she said, very earnestly:

"Dearest Julia, I hope you have forgiven me?"

Miss Desmond looked her lips, and stood for some moments with her face quite fixed, staring at vacancy. There were hollow rings round the dark eyes now, and the oval cheeks had lost their smooth outline. Perpetual drudgery and friendless solitude had brought Julia very low; but the Desmond pride still struggled for the mastery over its grim assailant—necessity.

"I don't know that I have anything to forgive," she said, after an ominous pause: "Mr. Tredethlyn was free to transfer his affections as often as he chose. I was very glad to read of your marriage, for it was at least satisfactory to find that he had not changed his mind a second time. I do not blame any one but myself, Mrs. Tredethlyn. I should have been wiser than to entrust my happiness to a man who—" Miss Desmond stopped abruptly. She made a long pause, during which she contemplated Maude almost as if she had been looking for some tender spot in which to plant her dagger.

"I must not forget that he is your husband, and I do not wish to say anything humiliating to you; but I cannot forget that he is not a gentleman. No gentleman would have treated any woman as Mr. Tredethlyn treated me."

If Julia's conscience had a voice it might perhaps have chimed in with an awkward question here: "And would any lady have spread a net to catch a rich husband, Julia, trading on the generosity of his simple nature, and angling for the fortune of a man whose heart was obviously given to another?"

Mrs. Tredethlyn's bright face crimsoned, and her lower lip fell a little. It is not to be supposed that she could be very fond of her husband, but she felt any allusion to his shortcomings almost as keenly as if he had been the incarnation of her girlish dreams. Whatever he was, he was hers, and she was responsible for him.

"If generosity of heart could make a gentleman, Julia," she said, almost entreatingly, "I think Francis would be the first of gentlemen."

Miss Desmond did not condescend to reply to this observation.

"Oh, Julia," Mrs. Tredethlyn said, after another little pause, "how can you be so unkind and unforgiving? Have you forgotten how happy we used to be together long ago at the Cedars? If—if I thought you were pleasantly circumstanced now, I would not worry you with any proffers of friendship; but somehow I cannot think that you are happy. Dear Julia, forgive me for the past and trust me once more."

The stony look in Miss Desmond's face did not melt away under the influence of Maude's tenderness; but presently, with an almost awful suddenness, she sank upon the nearest chair, dropped her face upon her clasped hands, and burst into a passion of tears—convulsive sobs, that shook her with their hysterical force. The strong will of the Desmonds asserted itself to the very last, for this passionate outburst was almost noiseless. The slender frame writhed and trembled, the chest heaved, the small hands were clenched convulsively, but there was no vulgar outcry. Miss Desmond recovered herself almost as suddenly as she had given way to her emotion, and drew up her head proudly though her face was blotted with tears.

"Heaven help me," she exclaimed; "what a poor weak creature I am."

"You will let me be your friend again, won't you, Julia? You'll come and live with me once more? You need see very little of Mr. Tredethlyn if you dislike him. He and I are quite fashionable people, I assure you, and he is very seldom at home. I shall be so glad to have you with me. I go a great deal into society, and I know you like society, Julia. Come, dear, let us be friends again, just as we used to be in the dear old times."

Maude gave a little sigh. She was apt now and then to think sentimentally of that remote period of her existence, some four or five years back, when she had believed that the happiest fate that Heaven could award her would be a union with Harcourt Lowther. Even now, though she had schooled herself to think of him coldly, though she tried very hard not to think of him at all, the memory of the old time would come back; the picture of the home that might have been—the little cottage in St. John's Wood—the long quiet evenings, made delightful by genial companionship—the pleasant hours devoted to art—the dear old concertante duets by Mozart and Beethoven—the "two souls with but a single thought, two hearts that beat as one,"—the images of these things were apt to rise suddenly before her, in the midst of her frivolous pleasure in her fine dresses, and gorgeous house, and admiring friends.

"Dear Julia," she said, winding one arm caressingly about the Irish girl, "you will come, won't you?"

"Yes," Miss Desmond answered, "I will come, if you want me. But I must come upon a new footing. This time I must work for my wages. I have been a hired slave ever since I left your father's house. I will be your servant, Mrs. Tredethlyn, if you chose to hire me."

"Julia, you will be my friend, just as you used to be."

"No," cried Miss Desmond, with a resolute gesture of her hand, "no; if you want a companion to keep your keys and attend to your lap-dogs, to finish fancy work that you have begun and grown tired of, to read French novels to you when you want to be read to sleep, to write your letters of invitation, to take the bass in your duets, or carry an occasional message to your milliner,—if you want a person of this kind, I am quite willing to be that person."

"Julia!"

"I will come to you on those terms or not at all."

"You shall come to me on any terms you please, so long as you come."

"Very well, then, I will come. My present employer gives me sixty guineas a year, and makes me work harder than a pack-horse. You can give me the same money if you think my services worth so much. I will make arrangements for leaving my present situation. A housemaid left the other day and I believe she gave her mistress a month's notice—I suppose the same rule will hold with me—I will come to you at the end of that time, unless you change your mind in the mean time."

"I shall not change my mind; I only wish you could come to me to-day. Take my card, dear, and give me yours."

"I have no cards," answered Miss Desmond. "I have neither name nor place in the world, and have no need of visiting cards."

She wrote her address upon the back of an envelope and gave it to Mrs. Tredethlyn. To the last her manner was cold and ungracious; but Maude parted from her, happy in the idea that she had rescued her old companion from a life of drudgery.

"Why should I not be a hired slave? I shall still have the right to hate her," thought Miss Desmond, as she went back to Bayswater with her gloomy charges.

THE LYING SERVANT.

THERE lived in Swabia a certain lord, pious, just, and wise, to whose lot it fell to have a serving-man, a great rogue, and, above all, addicted to the vice of lying. The name of the lord is not in the story, therefore the reader need not trouble himself about it.

The knave was given to boast of his wondrous travels. He had visited countries which are nowhere to be found in the map, and seen things which mortal eyes never beheld. He would lie through the twenty-four hours of the clock—for he dreamed falsehoods through his sleep, to the truth of which he swore when he was awake. His lord was a cunning as well as a virtuous man, and used to see the lies in the valet's mouth, so that he was often caught—hung as it were in his own truths, as in a trap. Nevertheless he persisted still the more in his lies, and when any one said, "How can that be?" he would answer, with fierce oaths and protestations, that so it was. He swore, stone and bone, and might the —, and so forth! Yet was the knave useful in the household, quick and handy; therefore he was not disliked of his lord, though verily a great liar.

It chanced, one pleasant day in spring, after the rains had fallen heavily, and swollen much the floods, that the lord and the knave rode out together, and their way passed through a shady and silent forest. Suddenly appeared an old and well-grown fox. "Look!" exclaimed the master of the knave: "look, what a huge beast! never before have I seen a reynard so large!" "Doth this beast surprise thee by its hugeness?" replied straight the serving groom, casting his eye slightly on the animal, as he fled for fear away into the cover of the brakes; "by stone and bone, I have been in a kingdom where the foxes are big as are the bulls in this!" Whereupon, hearing so vast a lie, the lord answered calmly, but with mockery in his heart, "In that kingdom there must be excellent lining for the cloaks, if furriers can there be found well to dress skins so large!"

And so they rode on—the lord in silence: but soon he began to sigh heavily. Still he seemed to wax more and more sad in spirit, and his sighs grew deeper and more quick. Then inquired the knave of the lord what sudden affliction, or cause of sorrow had happened. "Alas!" replied the wily master, "I trust in heaven's goodness that neither of us two hath to-day, by any frowardness of fortune, chanced to say the thing which is not; for, assuredly, he that hath so done must this day perish." The knave, on hearing these doleful words, and perceiving real sorrow to be depicted on the paleness of his master's countenance, instantly felt as if his ears grew more wide, that not a word or syllable of so strange a discovery might escape his troubled sense. And so, with eager exclamations, he demanded of the lord to ease his suspense, and to explain why so cruel a doom was now about to fall upon companionable liars.

"Hear, then, dear knave," answered the lord, to the earnestness of his servant, "since thou must needs know, hearken! and may no trouble come to thee from what I shall say. To-day we ride far, and in our course is a vast and heavy rolling flood, of which the ford is narrow, and the pool is deep; to it hath heaven given the power of sweeping down into its dark holes all dealers in falsehood, who may rashly venture to put themselves within its truth-loving current! But to him who hath told no lie, there is no fear of this river. Spur we our horses, knave, for to-day our journey must be long."

Then came they to a brook. Its waters were small, and its channel such as a boy might leap across. Yet, nevertheless, the knave began to tremble, and falteringly asked, "Is this now the river where harmless liars must perish?" "This, ah, no!" replied the lord; "this is but a brook; no liar need tremble here." Yet was the knave not wholly assured, and, stammering, he said, "My gracious lord, thy servant now bethinks him, that he to-day hath made a fox too huge: that of which he spake was verily not so large as is an ox, but, stone and bone, as big as is a good-sized roe!"

The lord replied, with wonder in his tone. "What of this fox concerneth me? If large or small, I care not. Spur we our horses, knave, for to-day our journey must be long."

Long, indeed, still thought the serving-groom, and in sadness he crossed the brook. Then came they to a stream, running quickly through a green meadow, the stones showing themselves in many places above its frothy water. The varlet started, and cried aloud, "Another river! surely of rivers there is to-day no end: was it of this thou talkedst heretofore?" "No," replied the lord, "not of this." And more he said not; yet marked he with inward gladness his servant's fear. "Because, in good truth," rejoined the knave, "it is on my conscience to give thee note, that the fox of which I spake was not bigger than a calf!" "Large or small, let me not be troubled with thy fox: the beast concerneth me not at all."

As they quitted the wood, they perceived a river in the way, which gave sign of having been swollen by the rains, and on it were a boat. "This, then, is the doom of liars," said the knave, and he looked earnestly towards the passage-craft. "Be informed, my good lord, that Reynard was not larger than a fat wedder sheep!" The lord seemed angry, and answered, "This is not yet the grave of falsehood: why torment me with this fox? Rather spur we our horses, for we have far to go." "Stone and bone," said the knave to himself, "the end of my journey approacheth!"

Now the day declined, and the shadow of the travellers lengthened on the ground; but darker than the twilight was the sadness on the face of the knave. And as the wind rustled the trees, he ever and anon turned pale, and inquired of his master if the noise were of a torrent or stream of water. Still, as the evening fell, his eyes strove to discover the course of a winding river. But nothing of the sort could he discern; so that his spirits began to revive, and he was fain to join in discourse with the lord. But the lord held his peace, and looked as one who expects an evil thing.

Suddenly the way became steep, and they descended into a low and woody valley, in which was a broad and black river creeping fearfully along, like the dark stream of Lethe, without bridge or bark to be seen near. "Alas! alas!" cried the knave, and the anguish oozed from the pores of his pale face.

"Ah! miserable me! this, then, is the river in which liars must perish!" "Even so," said the lord; "this is the stream of which I spake; but the ford is sound and good for true men. Spur we our horses, knave, for night approacheth, and we have yet far to go."

"My life is dear to me," said the trembling serving-man; "and thou knowest that were it lost, my wife would be disconsolate. In sincerity then, I declare that the fox which I saw in the distant country was not larger than he who fled from us in the wood this morning!"

Then laughed the lord aloud, and said, "Ho, knave! wert thou afraid of thy life? and will nothing cure thy lying? Is not falsehood, which kills the soul, worse than death, which has mastery only over the body? This river is no more than any other, nor hath it a power such as I feigned. The ford is safe, and the waters gentle as those we have already passed; but who shall pass thee over the shame of this day? In it thou must needs sink, unless penitence come to help thee over, and cause thee to look back on the gulf of thy lies, as on a danger from which thou hast been delivered by heaven's grace." And as he railed against his servant, the lord rode on into the water, and both in safety reached the opposite shore. Then vowed the knave, by stone and bone, that from that time forward he would duly measure his words, and glad was he to escape. Such is the story of the lying servant and the merry lord, by which let the reader profit.—London Magazine.

YANKEE PERSEVERANCE.—The following little anecdote, which we clip from an exchange, would have done honor to Sam Slick, had he been the subject of it:

An itinerant map-seller went into a merchant's counting-room near our office the other day, and asked the occupant if he wished to purchase a map. "No," was the tart reply. "Will you look at one?" "No; I have more of my own than I have time to examine?" "Will you allow me to look at yours, then?" "Yes; there they hang." "Well, while I am looking at yours, I'll just unroll mine—that, you know, won't hurt anybody." So the map-vender displayed several of his best at full length upon the counter, and then quietly commenced looking at the merchant's which hung against the wall. After making a few observations about some curious water-falls, caves, etc., at places which he traced out upon the map before him, he managed to engage the merchant's attention, and at last referred to his own map, lying on the counter, for a more perfect illustration of his description, and finally so much interested the auditor that he bought three different maps, at six dollars each, of the peddler, and very politely asked him to call again when he got out a new edition.

THE CALIFORNIAN.

SAN FRANCISCO, SATURDAY, APRIL 29, 1865.

SHERMAN.

THE war has brought some cruel iconoclasm. During the last four years the military idols of the people have one by one been pulled from their niches by the steady progress of circumstances and events. McClellan, Hooker, Sigel, Burdette, Pope, McDowell and Fremont have been successively worshipped and cast down. The list seems to be long enough without adding to it the name of Wm. T. Sherman, who has achieved greater military results than any of the preceding heroes, who has enjoyed more universally the confidence of the people, and who, unlike his predecessors, did not lose it in the line of his strict military duty. Not the most ardent of his admirers, we venture to say, ever claimed for him peculiar excellence in statesmanship. As a soldier only was he known and admired. But unfortunately that disposition of our people which leads them to nominate warriors to the highest political offices—that principle which gave us Taylor and Harrison as Presidents—intensifies their disappointment at the egregious blunder of Sherman. Perhaps it would not be too much to say that a knowledge of this expectancy on the part of the people may have led the victorious soldier astray. To claim active freedom from ambition in a vigorous, able leader like Sherman, is to claim for him a simple weakness. It would have been such a crowning laurel for the victorious general to have been handed down to posterity as the maker of Peace, and to finish as a statesman the work begun as a warrior!

But, alas! since the days of Alcibiades and Cæsar, the warrior and statesman are rarely found bleuded in the same individual. Wellington and "Malbrook," were narrow-minded politicians and bigoted counsellors. Buckle, in his History of Civilization, accounts for this peculiarity by the progress of society, which, refining and elevating the statesman and thinker, has pushed aside the military order—leaving its ranks to be recruited by mediocrity. Gen. Sherman, as a private citizen, has shown nothing to claim exemption from the conditions of this hypothesis. The very qualities, perhaps, which we admired in him unfitted him for diplomacy. It does not necessarily follow that because he was an uncompromising, earnest fighter, he would necessarily display the same qualities as a politician. The officer who pursues and overtakes a criminal is not pre-eminently fitted to settle the quality of his punishment or the terms of a compromise. The blunder was not so much in the form of Sherman's treaty as in the assumption of the power to make a treaty at all.

Most of our readers will remember a letter published not long ago, purporting to have been written by General Sherman to a young lady. It discoursed chiefly of the political aspect of the war, and enunciated a policy which, while it might have been the writer's, was not then and never has been the policy of the Administration. Those who read the letter and really respected the manly, soldier-like qualities of the General, could not help smiling at the authoritative and somewhat conceited tone of the epistle, as well as the circumstances under which it was written. It would have been much better for Sherman and much better for the young lady, had she demanded and received a simple autograph, which was probably all she required. But this opportunity of putting himself in the statesman's attitude, even before so humble an admirer, it seems was too great to be resisted by the honest general. Fancy Cæsar inditing a letter to a young Roman lady from the camp beyond the Nervii, with an elaborate description of his peculiar policy!

While we contend that the military glory of Sherman should not be dimmed by this contretemps, the shadow that has fallen upon his individual prestige has served to bring out in clearer relief the calm and evenly poised character of his superior, Lieut. General Grant. We do not wish to institute an invidious comparison between these men at such a moment. Practically there is no rivalry between them, nor should there be. Sherman is the incarnation of persistency—Grant of tenacity. The mistake of the former was the mistake of a peculiar temperament which has to some extent given a complexion to our national character. The glory of the latter is the glory of that patient self-reliance and fortitude which has been its deeper, underlying quality.

"A DEATH-BLOW TO CIVILIZATION."

AN editorial in the Journal of the Trades and Working-men, entitled "A Death Blow to Civilization," and which would appear also to include an annihilating attack on everything and everybody, not excluding even the rules of syntax, contains a remarkable sentence. The editor, as nearly as we can understand him, wishes to throw the crime of the assassination of the President on radical Northern men, and also to inveigh against the rioters of the 16th inst., whom he charges with wishing to overthrow the Catholic Church. We will premise that the italics are his:

"Madmen! Why do these zealots seek, invariably when occasions arise, to spend their fury on the Catholic Church? That Rock of Ages can any day, with the appliances within its reach, coerce every rascally contractor, defaulter, or villain of every degree, to bring his ill-gotten gains and lay them at the foot of the altar! Is it an instinctive knowledge of this fact that prompts these radical elements to surge and beat against the Church's door; or is it a blind hatred of those who hold to that faith?"

Why should this awful power, vested in the "Rock of Ages," which can "coerce rascally contractors," throw the editor into a passion? And, if it were not too much to ask, what has it to do with a death blow to civilization? And what right has the writer to insinuate that villains of every degree have pecuniary relations to the Catholic Church? The above looks to us very much like a wild bid for the Catholic influence, since the late suppression of the Monitor, and as such we are willing to pass by the minor ambiguities of style and the dark hints of a power in the land above its laws and ordinances, which we think all sensible Catholics will unhesitatingly disavow. But we submit that an organ of this ostensible character—a journal of workingmen, who are by instinct loyal, democratic and law-abiding, and who have shown deep and sympathetic feeling for the loss of their best friend, the Chief Magistrate—is misrepresented by any writer who uses such a crisis to repeat the old formulas of a nearly extinct party.

EXIT BOOTH.

BEFORE the body of the murdered President had been committed to the dust, it appears that his assassin was overtaken and killed. The miserable actor who waved his gleaming dagger before the footlights in the first act of this terrible tragedy, has passed with theatrical rapidity through each successive act to the usual retributive denouement. The probabilities of his being taken alive were few. He was doubtless as prepared to perish within the building in which his cruel deed was accomplished, as he was to meet the fire of the soldiers who surrounded the bar where he was finally despatched. The desperation which had moved him to his fiendish crime did not probably desert him in his last extremity. The ordinary course of justice could have affected no greater result than this, in the impossibility of awarding perfect retribution; yet some disappointment will be felt that the murderer was not brought before the bar of an offended sovereignty, tried, convicted and executed on the gallows for example's sake. But his accomplices, and the arch plotters of which he was but a pitiful tool, still afford us ample opportunities for the exercise of legal vengeance.

THEN AND NOW.—Rev. M. C. Briggs addressed a meeting of citizens of Sacramento, recently, (held for the purpose of giving expression to public sorrow at the death of the President,) and in the course of his remarks, alluded to the change which had occurred in California on the question of slavery since the time when the effort was made to fasten the institution upon us by the adoption of a slave State Constitution. Mr. Briggs, it will be remembered, was one of the delegates from this State to the Convention at Baltimore which nominated Lincoln and Johnson. Speaking of his emotions as he stood in that Convention, he says:

I, in my rather limited circle, unknown to the great multitudes, standing there upon a distant shore, remembered that here, because I had felt deep down in my heart that I ought to defend the great principles of human liberty; that I ought to try to stop the machinations of the men who sought to drag slavery into this State, and by the connivance of the Governor frame our Constitution in defense of it. Because I thought I ought to expose this damnable scheme and try to help brave and good men nip it in the bud, rotten eggs came flying around me swift and fast as our bullets have since that flown against the gates of treason. How, then, could I help feeling that the world had suddenly turned bottom side up, or rather right side up? It had been wrong side up a great while, and it had just righted with a suddenness that might well unsettle the solid foundations upon which any man stood.

A RACE was advertised to take place in Sacramento on the 22d inst., the competing animals being the mare Yellow Gal and the camel Cinderella, to sulkies. The Arabian damsel took the conditions literally, and after a few efforts, under the lash, became "too sulky" to proceed further, disappointing the assembled thousands. Such conduct was very shabby, as she had been heavily "backed." Her owner will probably select some vehicle of less ominously suggestive title for the next race.

NEW BOOKS FROM ROMAN'S.

CONSPICUOUS even among the general elegance of the books received from A. Roman & Co. is Harper's late edition of Thackeray's Vanity Fair. The work is in three volumes and is printed in the highly respectable old-fashioned type now so much in vogue—the very dilettanteism of typography. The paper is tinted and the book bound in exquisite taste. The neat, well known sign-manual of the author is on the cover. His calm, gentlemanly face and honest, truthful eyes look at us from the frontispiece, drawn from Lawrence's famous picture. His own pencil has enlivened the pages with that grotesque humor peculiar to all his caricatures—a humor not always as delicate and subtle as his pen sketches, and more like Gilroy than Leach—but still so like himself, and so indispensably a part of our recollections of Vanity Fair, that we would not have it supplanted. As for the story, what new criticism can be added to the universal judgment of mankind? The last verdict relieves the satirist of the imputation of unkindness, and in the light of his manly, honest life and tender nature, now thoroughly understood, we read the more eagerly, and appreciate the more keenly the moral of his world-famous story.

Tony Butler, republished from the English edition, has an anonymous authorship, but is attributed to Charles Lever. The London Saturday Review gives the following humorous synopsis of the internal evidence on which the accusation is based:

"Mr. Lever's stories are mainly of travelled Irishmen of the middle class. It is easy enough to anticipate his tales. His young hero spends his youth in his own country—that is essential; and, generally speaking, is remarkable for athletic power, intellectual deficiency, and a tendency to fall in boyish love with some young lady rather older than himself, and who would be far above him in station only for the good old rule that 'one Irish family is always as good as another—if not better.' Of course the young gentleman is torn away; he enters the English, French, Austrian or Garibaldian army; he becomes aid-de-camp to an Emperor, a field-marshal, or a filibuster; he serves with distinction, gets several wounds and has brain-fever. This is essential. We do not remember any of Mr. Lever's novels where the hero did not get brain-fever; it is as inevitable as James' 'last rays of the setting sun,' or Wouvermon's 'white horse,' or perhaps it is a kind of 'trade-mark' to preclude piracy. A Sister of Charity is then introduced, and scraps of French light up the story. Then we have more adventure; some temporary infidelity to the first love, in the shape of a flirtation with an Austrian Princess, or a Spanish señora, or an Italian dama; the presence of the hero at a great battle—Leipsic, Waterloo, Solferino, or the capture of Naples; intimate conversations with Napoleon, Wellington, Cavour, Talleyrand, or Garibaldi; and restoration, finally, to the object of his early attachment, who has followed him etc., thrilled at etc., etc., and 'wept tears of joy to hear him praised.' This is the only Lever novel; without these marks none are genuine. One would think that, without the author's signature, we could not rely upon the real article. But the new story, Tony Butler, dispels this delusion. Whether Mr. Lever merely wishes to conceal his name, or whether he has lent his pen to some brother of the craft, there can be no doubt that we have here all the old conditions of those light gentlemanly tales. There is, as usual, no plot to speak of; the slight personal interest we take in the hero is the only thread to connect the history of various adventures at home and abroad. The characters are, where slightly sketched, happily hit off; but where the author wishes to depict some strikingly peculiar personage the portrait is, as usual, a caricature."

In spite of this sharp criticism, the book is exceedingly entertaining—as are all of Mr. Lever's novels. The Irish scenes are particularly charming and replete with humor, and the narrative is always kept up in an easy gentlemanly style of raconteur, quite free from mawkish sentiment or boyish philosophy.

Strathmore; or, Wrought by his own Hand, is the somewhat alarming title of a new novel from the publishing house of J. B. Lippincott & Co. It is by "Ouida," author of Granville de Vigne. As we have never been fortunate enough to peruse Granville de Vigne, or to meet anybody who had, we are unable to make any comparison of their respective merits, and are consequently not impelled through a thrilling recollection of the author's former work to undertake the 622 pages of the latter. We may remark incidentally that many books of this quality have some such distant reference in their title page, and which may possibly mean to imply that the author has written worse things. A good deal of the power of Ouida seems to have been lavishly employed in the titles of chapters—a vigor hardly equalled by the play-bills of the melodrama. We have "The White Domino Powdered with Gold Bees," "The Kismet that was Written on a Millefleurs scented Note," which must have been something pretty, "The Ashes in the Lamp," "A Message from the Dead," "God's Acre by the Sea," "Seized in the name of the Emperor," and "Lost in the Holiness of Redemption," which, as a mystifying and darkly-enigmatical statement, certainly surpasses the rhetoric of the play-bill. The style of the author is fully equal to the above. We have the following philosophic preamble: "Mes freres!—it is well for us that we are no seers." This is evidently a mistake of the printer. It should read thus:

"Mes freres!"

It is well for us that we are no seers."

which at least is a passable rhyme. But to continue:

"Were we cursed with prevision, could we know how, when the idle trifle of the present hour shall have been forged into a link of the past, it will stretch out and bind captive a whole future in its bonds, we should be paralyzed, hopeless powerless old ere even we were young. It is well for us that we are no seers!"

And under the circumstances we should certainly say it was.

We admit we are at a loss to understand this Strathmore. Wicked he certainly must be, for we are informed that "his haughty and sin-stained soul hung on a young and fragile life," which, under all the circumstances, must be admitted to be an extremely precarious situation. But then we are comforted by knowing (at least we have the author's word for it) that Strathmore's life, "if stained with great crimes was riven with great remorse," and that he was one of those "natures passion-stained and crime-steeped, but which, even as they had spared none in their guilt, spared not themselves in their expiation." All this is sufficiently obscure being a mixture of Sartor Resartus and Guy Livingstone. The author rises to rare height in chapter fifty-third. Great pains are taken to tell us that the night was wild. It being repeated again and again throughout the chapter. "A night to drown death-shrieks," a night in which "the ringed-lightning whirled down the sky," etc., etc. Notwithstanding, the author seems to think it praiseworthy in Strathmore that "he stood looking in silence outward," and with "his head uncovered." Silence undoubtedly was to be expected on such a night as this, and as to his head being uncovered, we suppose his hat was blown off the moment he ventured out. Of course, it is not to be supposed that an author capable of talking of "crime-steeped" and "passion-stained" should regard grammatical composition. Accordingly we have "his eyes meeting the electric glare unflinching." "Her face was very pale, the tears hung heavy on her lashes." "She spoke quick," etc. We think it would be difficult to find, even in Pierce Egan or Mrs. Wood, many such instances as the following, with which we conclude, though many such are to be found in Strathmore; or, Wrought by his own Hand.

"She was the incarnation of radiant, joyous, shadowless youth, beautiful and ethereal as the dawn, in those hours which he had promised her they should spend alone, as she played, like the child she was, with the greyhound on the hearth, and sang in music that echoed down the air like the glorious gladness of a forest bird, and threw herself at Strathmore's feet in all the grace and abandon of repose, while the fragrant brilliance of the aloes' flame gleamed on her face, and she told him of a hundred poetic thoughts and fairy fancies and pure ambitions that lived in him, and saw in him the glory of their dreams."

We have not the slightest notion what this means, though perhaps it is all very clear to "Ouida."

Hooker's Mineralogy and Geology is Part III. of a popular series from the press of the Harpers, entitled Science for the School and Family. It is a text book for the student, and seems to be especially adapted to the wants of young beginners.

OPERA MATTERS.

THE Bianchi troupe have had a pecuniary success during the past week. But, with the exception of Ernani—which seems to suit the energy and somewhat redundant power of the baritone—the operas have been poorly supported by the company, and Il Barbiere, as given at the Metropolitan, was a comic opera in more senses than one. Morelli's really fine voice seems somewhat worn by age, and has lost that delicacy which would enable him to give suitable expression to Rossini's music.

Maguire's troupe have arrived, and will open with Il Trovatore, on Tuesday evening, and the following cast: "Leonora," Signora Olivia Sconzia; "Azucena," Adelaide Phillips; "Manrico," Signor Sbriglia, and "Conte di Luna," Signor Domenico Orlandini. Adelaide Phillips is the best known of the troupe, and has a reputation that should justify a proper support from the other members.

Gottschalk has also arrived, but will not probably appear before the public for two or three weeks; he is accompanied by Miss Luey Simons and Signor Muzio, who is said to be a nephew of Verdi.

A DRUGGIST in Sacramento advertises for sale all the appliances of death usual to his vocation, and "also the celebrated Florence Sewing Machine." The meaning of the combination is "shrouded" in no mystery—his customers may arrange with him not only the manner of their "taking-off" but of their "sewing-up" at the same interview.

An amusing scene occurred lately at the theatre in Rouen. A note was thrown on the stage, and upon the manager refusing to read it, two young men sprang from the parquette, seized the director, and compelled him to read the note. It substantially begged the management to discharge an actress who had, during the previous fifty years, played the role of young women and lovers. The writer thought that the people had been constant enough during the fifty years, but that they were not married to the lady! A long and prolonged scene of laughter followed the reading of the note, as well as the ridiculous situation.

THE PETROLEUM FIEND.

A STORY OF TO-DAY.

PART ONE.

IT was a clear night in midsummer. The streets of San Francisco were deserted, and wore that aspect of wind-swept loneliness peculiar to a climate which a local press wildly imagined to be Italian. A few dissipated losels were deviously making their way home by the light of the gas lamps that flickered tremulously, and of the stars that high up in the breezy heavens winked incessantly, as though they were inclined to shut their eyes on this and a good many other naughty exhibitions of the wicked metropolis. In fact, it was such a night as the devil might be popularly supposed to be abroad; though why he, more than we, should prefer such exposure to an easy chair and a sparkling fire has, I believe, never been clearly demonstrated.

From the window of a brilliantly-lighted apartment in one of the fashionable thoroughfares, Mr. and Mrs. Sparrowhawk looked upon the night. They had been married but a twelve-month. Each being poor and obviously unfitted for the responsibilities of wedlock, their courtship had met with such strenuous opposition from their respective friends as to result, as usual, in a speedy marriage. Mr. Sparrowhawk met the difficulties of his new condition with characteristic philosophy. Returning from the bridal trip, as he handed his last half-dollar to the porter, the loving bride ventured to ask the momentous question:

"On what are we to live?"

"On others," was the quiet response. Hiding her white crape bonnet in his bosom the blushing girl expressed herself satisfied. Through all the financial troubles of the honeymoon she proved herself a worthy helpmeet. Her husband's old creditors looked with dismay as they found the delicate tact and firm instincts of the subtle sex, added to the masculine audacity of the male Sparrowhawk. Nor was this all. Her jewelry, purchased on credit, she freely sacrificed. "These trinkets are not mine," reasoned that affectionate creature, "but his;" and she saw them pawned without a struggle.

The sagacious reader will readily imagine from the foregoing that Mr. and Mrs. S. were not engaged in sentimental contemplation of the heavens. The necessity of evading the claims of an impending creditor was just then under discussion, and a natural impulse had brought them both to the window, as if to find some solution of the financial question outside. "It does seem," said Mr. Sparrowhawk deliberately, "as if the very devil—" A little scream from his wife arrested him here, and the rest of his profligate reflection was lost. And well might Mrs. S. scream. As she turned away from the window with a slight contraction of her pretty brows she suddenly came upon a stranger standing upright in the middle of the floor.

"I beg your pardon," said the intruder, blandly, "but you seem to have been so pleasantly occupied as not to hear my knock. May I hope that I have also spared you the trouble of opening the door for me?"

He was a nice little bald-headed old gentleman, in an evening dress of black, neatly gloved and booted. Perhaps his instep was somewhat too high, and he moved gingerly as if his boots hurt him. But otherwise he was evidently such a parti as we are in the habit of meeting every evening in the lobby of the opera or at social gatherings. Mrs. S. recovered herself first—with the readiness of her sex—and begged him to be seated.

"My intrusion will seem the more pardonable, or unpardonable, rather let me say," he added, with an apologetic wave of the hand toward Mrs. S., "when I state that this interruption of a conjugal le-ta-te is occasioned by business. Business with Mr. Sparrowhawk."

Mrs. S., a little mollified, rose as if to depart, but the old gentleman skipped forward with a deprecating gesture: "Pray, don't go—oblige me. Whatever the ungallant opinion of the rest of mankind, permit me to say that I always found your lovely sex of invaluable service in all my business arrangements. Besides, he added a little hastily, as if to cover up an inadvertence, "what concerns your husband's welfare concerns you."

Still more mollified, and, I grieve to say, even swallowing this little bit of moral chaff with the rest, Mrs. S. resumed her seat gracefully. Where is the woman who could doubt the sincerity of such a compliment? She may doubt the tribute to her beauty; the sonnet to her amiability; but her business qualifications, never!

"Between men of business," continued the old gentleman, turning to the husband, "a few words suffice. You are a mining Secretary?"

"Yes."

Sparrowhawk had an office down town, the door whereof was ingeniously decorated with the titles of some twenty or thirty companies which had no other existence. Here he regularly read the papers, and published lists, selected at random from the directory, of delinquent stockholders. It certainly was not necessary for the old gentleman to twit him with that.

"And write for the papers?"

A slight glow suffused the cheek of Sparrowhawk! We all have our weaknesses. Here was a young man of fine predatory instincts and financial abilities, actually pleased with the accusation of literary effort. He answered quickly in the affirmative, and asked the stranger if had ever read his articles signed "Brutus?"

"Or his 'Monody on the Death of an Infant?'" chimed in Mrs. S.

"No—no," replied the stranger with a sudden display of nervous energy; "that is—yes; but I shall require your talents in both capacities. Now attend to me for a few moments. Observe this, if you please," and he drew from his breast pocket a phial of amber-colored liquid and handed it to Mr. Sparrowhawk.

Mr. S. looked at the phial dubiously. Mrs. S., true to her sex's instinct, admired the color.

"Smell it."

Sparrowhawk removed the cork and sniffed at the fluid. Spite of its delicate color it had an abominable sulphurous stench. "Petroleum!" he ejaculated.

"Exactly so. That's my business. I make it. Say the word and you shall be my agent. You shall puff it and sell it. Salary twenty thousand for the first year and commissions. Agreement for three years."

Mr. and Mrs. Sparrowhawk gasped for breath. "I beg your pardon," stammered Mr. Sparrowhawk, "but did I understand you to say you made it? I thought it was found—that is, discovered in wells—you know—holes!" and the poor fellow glanced uneasily at the stranger and back again to his wife.

But that noble young woman did not lose her self-possession. "Of course the gentleman said he made it," she replied somewhat pettishly, "and what if he does? There's no great harm in that. What if he keeps a quantity on hand—more than he wants for use?"

"For use?" said the stranger, bowing delightedly.

"Or Fuel!" said Mrs. S.

"Or FUEL," repeated the little old gentleman, smiling and rubbing his hands, as he gazed at the bright eyes and excited color of the pretty Mrs. Sparrowhawk.

"Or, what if he should want a smart young man to devote himself to his interests at a large salary; there's no harm in that," continued Mrs. S.

"No harm in that," repeated the overjoyed old gentleman.

"Or, if he wanted him to sign an agreement?"

"An agreement!" repeated that venerable echo.

"Why, he'd be a fool if he didn't," was Mrs. Sparrowhawk's somewhat ungrammatical climax.

Poor Sparrowhawk gazed with open mouth at the mysterious visitor and his ally. Before he could find breath to speak, the old gentleman had drawn a document from his pocket and laid it before him. His own wife brought him a pen already dipped in ink.

"Sign!" said the old gentleman.

"Sign!" repeated Mrs. S.

Sparrowhawk took up the pen irresolutely, and hesitated. A struggle took place in his bosom and his better genius prevailed. He laid down the pen. "Give me a half year's salary in advance," he asked firmly.

"Done," said the old gentleman.

Sparrowhawk signed. At the same moment an earthquake rattled the shelves and jarred the whole house.

"The manufactory is at work," quietly remarked the old gentleman.

Another shock, stronger than before, caused Mr. and Mrs. Sparrowhawk to rush wildly to the door. When their alarm had subsided they turned to their mysterious visitor, but he had disappeared.

THE TABLES TURNED.—Some of the Union men of East Tennessee who suffered from rebel persecution in every way that barbarous ingenuity could suggest, are availing themselves of the restoration of law and order in that section, to make their arrogant oppressors pay good round sums for damages inflicted. Brownlow's Knoxville, Whig of March 1st, mentions the following awards of juries in cases recently tried: The heirs of the estate of Sam Pickens, deceased, recovered $40,000 from Sneed, Crozier and Reynolds, of Knox county, leading instigators of the rebellion, who caused the imprisonment of said Pickens, a man aged sixty-five years, on account of his loyalty to the Union. Pickens died in prison, and his aged wife did not long survive the shock which the death of her husband visited upon her. . . . Horace Foster recovered $25,000 in a suit against James Smith, Franklin Smith, Fred Lenoir, W. M. Cox, J. L. Cox, H. S. Cox, Henry Buram and W. S. Johnson. Proof was produced that the persons named induced the rebels to rob Foster of horses, mules, bacon, tobacco, grain and hay, and then to shoot him; and while wounded and bleeding he was driven through a creek in water up to his armpits. . . . Parson Brownlow himself has recovered $25,000 from Sneed, Crozier and Reynolds, for having caused his arrest, imprisonment and banishment from the State three years ago.

DINNERING.

THAT tocsin of the soul, the dinner-bell, gives the signal for a multitude of observances, of which I will select a few variations as the best way of illustrating rules.

Everywhere the preliminaries of dining are essentially the same.

Except on state or official occasions, or with slight acquaintances and superiors, dinner invitations are often given, abroad as well as at home, by word of mouth, at a friendly call or a casual meeting. "Will you favor me with the pleasure of your company to dinner on such a day?" Your friend's dinner hour is probably known to you. There is the same ill-breeding in coming late, the same want of tact and inconvenience in arriving too early. You are bound to answer every written invitation immediately; any delay in doing so causes your acceptance to be implied. It is bad taste to require pressing to accept a verbal invitation to dinner. People who are sensible either accept at once frankly, or regret that they cannot, stating the reason why.

Owing, perhaps, to military habits, Continental dinners are, I think, more punctual than English ones; and the higher the grade of society the greater the punctuality. Many first-rate continental tables d'hôte are punctual to a minute. Instantly after the last stroke of the church clock, the dinner-bell rings. The cook makes his arrangements accordingly. In general, it is better that you should have to wait ten minutes for the dinner than that the dinner should wait five for you. Want of punctuality at a rendezvous-dinner, as a picnic, hotel or restaurant, is nowhere other than culpability which merits repression by reprimand.

When the servant announces that dinner is served, the lady of the house takes the arm of the gentleman of highest rank or position, often designating certain ladies to be conducted by gentlemen, and all proceed to the dining-room, where places are taken "with a difference." In France, instead of our hostess at top and our host at bottom, the lady takes the middle of table, while her husband sits opposite. On her right is placed first gentleman, on her left, second gentleman: on his right, first lady, on his left, second lady. The places of the respective guests are often indicated by cards. Several German courts dine at round tables, which are extremely sociable when the party is not large, and are paternal and familiar when there is any considerable interval of rank between the persons who dine together. An oval table has its advantages.

I have seen, and do not like to see, the soup plates standing ready filled when you enter the dining room. The object is to enable every one to start fair, and begin dinner at the same moment. If the guests were famishing, it would be a benevolent precaution; but for people not actually dying of hunger, it too strongly suggests a dinner doled out to paupers or prisoners. Moreover, it deprives the hostess of the opportunity of serving soup herself to each guest, in the order of their rank or age, by way of welcome. At dinners where the carving is done at side-tables, and the viands sent round, the host or hostess should distribute at least some one dish with their own hands, (Talleyrand's constant practice,) as a graceful proof of their hospitable intentions, and to save their dinner from bearing too great a resemblance to a table d'hôte.

It used to be high caste in England to eat with a spoon everything that could be so eaten, except fish. Peas, pudding, curry, custard, were all conveyed to the mouth with a spoon. The same of serving. A lady, whose social position was dubious, caused opinion to pronounce that she was a lady by helping lemon-pudding with a spoon. Now-a-days, whether fork or spoon, or fork and spoon, you may do as you like, provided you do it without affectation. Nowhere may you eat anything with a knife.

It is not polite to express surprise, repugnance or ridicule at the introduction and consumption of any eatable which may be new or unusual to your own experience. The world is wide, and you have not yet seen the whole of it. If invited to experimental repasts, such as the Prince Napoleon's Chinese dinners or the recent French and German horseflesh banquets, you know what you have to expect beforehand, and can accept or decline accordingly. But if fortune unexpectedly bring you into contact with strange messes which others enjoy, good manners require you to look as if you could enjoy them if you pleased. I have seen people almost shont, in Germany, at beholding stewed prunes and fish come on in the middle of dinner. In a foreign seaport I have had a circle of rustics, raw from the interior, gather round me, to watch the wonderful feat of oyster-eating; but I soon put the savages to flight by insisting on their tasting them. I have been at tables where dog-fish (such as in England is used only for manure, unless to make cod-liver oil) was served, and relished, being said to be preferable to skate. I have sat next ladies who feasted on snails, and who would have been justly offended had my manner shown the little sympathy I felt for their taste. One man's poison is another man's meat. There is scarcely a nation which does not eat something which another nation repudiates as food; witness our consumption of beef, veal and pork, not to mention eels. During the famine, the Irish would as soon starve as eat Indian corn, while Cobbett, had he been still surviving, would have treated potatoes with similar repugnance.

"Is it quack-quack?" an Englishman, who was enjoying what he took for hashed duck, asked of his neighbor, a Chinaman.

"No, no; it is much better. It is bow-wow-wow," replied the yellow Oriental.

At a table d'hôte at a Pyrenean "waters," a mess of rice-milk was offered. It was nicely served in a raised dish, and its surface slightly browned with a salamander. It was a proper dish to present to a party, a certain portion of whom invalids restricted to a simple diet. A young Frenchman, in robust health, took rice-milk; but instead of eating, he smeared his plate with it, playing with his spoon, and showing other outward tokens of dislike. His lady mother, by his side, laughed heartily at her son's grimaces, and at his adolescent contempt for what had been the sustenance of his childhood.

"Tchut! tchut!" said the head waiter across the table, with a look which showed his sense of their indecorous conduct. Madame and young monsieur were instantly quiet, reserving their mirth for their private moments.

To stare hard at people while eating (or at any other time) is not polite. The French remedy for staring in the streets is good. If you regard a gentleman longer or more closely than politeness warrants, he takes off his hat to you. An Englishman would roughly remark: "I hope, sir, you'll know me again!"

It could not have been pleasant for the court of France to eat their public breakfasts, in which poor Louis XVI.'s dexterity in knocking off the top of his egg was a standing point of admiration for the crowd in the gallery. In Algeria, it is the height of rudeness to watch or remark on people while eating, and would give rise to sharp rebuffs.

"To see how you tear and swallow that mutton," said an Arab, "one would suppose that the sheep, during his lifetime, had butted your stomach with his horns."

"To see how slowly and lazily you chew it, one would say that his mother had been your wet nurse," was the angry reply.

During Lord Macartney's embassy to China, the mandarins and their followers took a fancy to enter the dining-hall and remain standing there all dinner-time, to observe how Europeans ate. Occasionally their curiosity got the better of their courtesy. One day a Chinaman, in his anxiety to see the whole operation, peered, open-mouthed, over the shoulder of a member of the embassy, and looked down into his plate. The Englishman could stand it no longer. Indiscreetly taking up a morsel with his fork, he thrust it into the Chinaman's mouth. The high-bred celestials took it as an affront. Every Manchoo-Tartar instantly left the room, and never more returned to see the barbarians feed. This incident was not the cause of the embassy's failure, but it certainly could do no good.

It is not polite, in a private house, to breathe in your glass and polish it with your napkin, or to wipe your plate, knife, fork or spoon, or, in short, to do anything which can imply a suspicion of the neatness and cleanliness of the service. In hotels and restaurants only you have the right, by paying for it, to take those precautions.

General Grosdos, who retained many of his army habits, was dining at a minister's house in Paris. When a livery servant came to fill his glass with wine, he anticipated the movement by wiping it with all his might and main. The hostess, fearing that some little accident had occurred, signed to the valet behind her to change the glass. The wiping process was recommenced, and the glass immediately changed, up to a third and a fourth, until the General, losing temper, whispered to his neighbor, a Senator's wife, "Does M. le Ministre mean to make game of me, by asking me to dinner to wipe his glasses?"

The lady, with some difficulty, got him to understand that what might be necessary in a camp canteen was quite unnecessary in a Parisian dining-room.

Napkins have their etiquette. They are to be laid open on the knees, and not fastened to the waistcoat or button-hole. At the close of a meal, at home, you may fold your napkin and slip it into its ring, to serve for another occasion. Out, you must leave your napkin, wiped up or exactly as you have finished with it, on the table. To fold it would look as if you considered yourself one of the family, or at least on a staying visit.

A guest, at the close of a breakfast to which he had been invited, carefully folded his napkin and laid it beside his plate. By way of rebuke, his hostess remarked, "I am delighted to have had your company to breakfast, but I don't remember having asked you to dinner, sir."

The lady was wrong. I venture to think—unkindly and unjustly sharp to her visitor. Neatness and order are minor virtues, even when applied to soiled linen. If I like to see even things sent to the wash neatly folded there is no harm in it, but the contrary, seeing that so they are more easily counted and occupy less space.

In morals, we are told that one man may steal a horse whilst another may not look over a hedge. It is the same in manners. Not only to one person are permitted eccentricities which would cause the exclusion of another, but in some societies habits are "the thing," which elsewhere would cause a start of horror. Amongst the Arabs (so severe and exacting on many points of etiquette) it is not unpolite, but rather a compliment to your entertainer, at the close of a dinner to indulge in an action which may be written but may scarcely be pronounced; for although Shakspeare has a Sir Toby Belch, we are nicer now than in Shakspeare's days. I remember a pork-butcher who made a great reputation by his "anti-eructative sausages." An Arab, if he ate sausages, would ask for the eructative sort. The same mode of relief was formerly allowable in old Spanish society, who doubtless derived the fashion from their Moorish masters.

Even more serious accidents are considered by the Arabs merely as marks of prosperity and proofs of a sharp appetite copiously satisfied. The culprit coolly says, "I thank Allah—" complete the ellipsis with, "for having given me wherewithal to fill my stomach." To which his neighbors reply with equal coolness, "May Allah preserve your health!"

At dessert, a colored finger-glass to each guest, purple, green, pink or blue—by alternating colors you get a pleasing effect upon the white cloth—is a good old custom. There is nothing indelicate in its proper use, and it is really useful. However neatly a person may eat, sugary sweets and juicy fruits will leave a trace on the finger-tips, not to mention asparagus if handled when eaten, which is permitted, if not pretty. Shrimps and shell-fish, which also are allowed to come in contact with the finger and thumb, betray the presence of saline elements. Now, it is uncomfortable, to say the least, for a young lady to draw on white gloves, or sit down to the piano, with clammy fingers. A finger-glass remedies the inconvenience. The hand may be dipped, the napkin slightly wetted and applied to the lips, and that is all, according to my code.

A refinement is to supply the finger-glasses with warm water mixed with eau de Cologne. The legend of the invention is this. Two friends strove, for a wager, which should give the more elegant dinner. The elegance of the dinners was so equal that the judges, puzzled, were near pronouncing for a drawn bet, when eau de Cologne in the finger-glasses at the second dinner, decidedly turned the scale in its favor.

In France water of mint is sometimes substituted for water of Cologne, which is no improvement, since it is not everybody who likes the scent. There is also another addition, which I must specify, to condemn it. In the midst of the finger-glass stands a smaller glass, containing water to rinse the mouth. You may do it, because other people do it, only don't if you ask me to dine. That you should not do it, may be proved syllogistically, thus:

In company nobody ought to do anything which can offend any member of that company. But to many people mouth-rinsing is an offensive operation. Ergo, mouth-rinsing is not an operation to be performed in company.

Alphonse Karr, novelist and gardener by trade, in his Le Chemin le plus Court, describes a feast given by a country dame, Madame Leloup (the Wolf), who is a satirical portrait of his own dear mother-in-law. It is an excellent lesson on what to avoid:

"She bought up every eatable in town, borrowed servants and plate, invited none but the most comme il faut people, and quarrelled with all her friends whom she did not invite. This dinner, which she called sans ceremonie, obliged her to sell a piece of pasture-land. Her dress was a droll assemblage of all the colors of the prism and several others besides. Her ten fingers were adorned with five and thirty rings. She never ceased begging her guests to excuse the plainness of her poor repast; but with friends there was no need to put oneself out. Sixty pounds of meat were set before ten people. She addressed only her titled guests, affecting for the others a disdain which she believed excessively distingué. She was pitiless in urging those dear friends to eat, loading their plates in spite of all resistance, till at last they feared she intended making them swallow the whole of the horrible quantity of food which she had heaped together. She burnt perfumes whose odor mixed with the smell of the sauces. She called, rebuked and scolded the servants. She panted and perspired. Her skin, completely scarlet, could scarcely contain her. She looked like an apoplectic cockchafer."

To improve which text, I here insist on the rule never to apologize for what you set before your friends. If it is bad taste for a host to praise the dinner on his table, it is still more inconsistent and ridiculous for him to make excuses for it. It is taken for granted, as a matter of course, that you give the very best at your command and within your means.

LONGFELLOW has returned his income as $14,171, and paid the tax upon it. Poetry is no longer synonymous with poverty, and a comfortable bank account does not exclude a worshipper from the closest communication with the Muses.

WHAT creatures took the smallest amount of baggage along when they entered the ark? The cock and the fox; they had but one comb and one brush between them.

STOP THAT COUGHING!

SOME of you can't, and we pity you. You have tried every remedy but the ONE destined by its intrinsic merit, to supersede all similar preparations. It is not surprising you should be reluctant to try something else after the many experiments you have made of the trashy compounds foisted on the public as a certain cure; but

NEWELL'S PULMONARY SYRUP!

Is really the VERY BEST remedy ever compounded for the cure of Coughs, Colds, Sore Throat, Asthma, Whooping Cough, Bronchitis and Consumption. Thousands of people in California and Oregon have been already benefited by the surprising curative powers of

NEWELL'S PULMONARY SYRUP,

And with one accord give it their unqualified approbation. We now address ourselves to all who are unacquainted with this, the greatest Panacea of the age, for the healing of all diseases of the Throat and Lungs, assuring you that

NEWELL'S PULMONARY SYRUP HAS CURED THOUSANDS!

And it will cure YOU if you try it.

This invaluable medicine is pleasant to the taste; soothing, healing and strengthening in its effects; entirely free from all poisonous or deleterious drugs, and perfectly harmless under all circumstances.

HOSTETTER'S CELEBRATED STOMACH BITTERS.

A TIMELY WARNING TO THE SICK.—It is especially important at this time, when the markets of the United States are flooded with the direst poisons, under the name of imported liquors, and when domestic compounds, purporting to be medicinal, but not a whit less pernicious, are heralded to the world as "sovereign remedies," that the public should fully understand the facts. Be it known, then, that while all the diffusive stimulants called liquors are impure, and all the Tonics containing alcohol are manufactured with a fiery article containing amyl or fusil oil, a mortal poison; HOSTETTER'S CELEBRATED STOMACH BITTERS contain none of these things, but are a combination of pure Essence of Rye with the pure juices of the most valuable stomachic, antibilious and aperient herbs and plants, and that as a safe and rapid remedy for Dyspepsia and all its kindred complaints, this preparation stands before the world without a rival or competitor. Its sales to-day are equal to the combined sales of all the other Tonics advertised in the United States, and the certificates which authenticate its usefulness are signed by individuals of the highest standing in every professional calling and walk of life. FARRAND'S OSCILLATING

Amalgamator.

THIS UNRIVALLED IMPROVEMENT FOR THE REDUCTION AND AMALGAMATION OF Gold and Silver Ores, is now running daily at No. 206 Commercial street, between Front and Davis.

THIS AMALGAMATOR INVOLVES

NO COMPLICATED MACHINERY

And possesses the following advantages over all others now in use:

1st. It is capable of doing double the amount of work of the ordinary Pans, at a saving of more than one-half the power.

2d. It reduces the pulp finer, thereby producing a better result.

3d. It requires less quicksilver by one-half at a charge, whilst the loss by trituration is comparatively nothing.

4th. As an Amalgamator for gold contained in sulphurets, as also for very fine or flour gold, it has no equal.

5th. This Amalgamator involves no complicated machinery, and is less liable to get out of order than any of the pans.

DESCRIPTION OF FARRAND'S AMALGAMATOR.

In offering this Amalgamator to the public the inventor does not claim any new or scientific method of extracting the precious metals from the ores; he merely claims a new and simple combination of mechanical principles, whereby a great saving of power (full one-half in amount) is effected. The capacity of the machine varies with its size. The smallest, or prospecting size, will reduce 400 lbs. in three hours, and can be easily worked by the power of one man. The largest size will work 1,500 lbs. in three hours, or six tons in 24 hours, with an application of a trifle more than one-horse power. This saving of power, as all mill-men are aware, is an important consideration particularly where fuel is scarce. The power so saved in running the Amalgamators may be advantageously employed to an increase of stamps, and thus proportionally increasing the work of the mill. This machine consists of a semi-cylindrical, trough-shaped vessel, in the interior of which is furnished with moveable concave discs, to be replaced when worn out, as in ordinary pans. The mullers are convex, and attached to a substantial rock shaft, by which they are moved back and forward by crank or eccentric motion. The mullers are held to their places by springs of moderate strength, the pressure of which may be easily regulated. The oscillating motion of the mullers serves to keep the pulp in a constant state of agitation, thoroughly mixing it, and passing it under the mullers without resort to any of the various expedients employed in Pans where a circular motion is maintained. The peculiar construction of this machine admits of its being worked with a much smaller charge of quicksilver, to any given amount of pulp than the flat-bottomed Pans. The spiral springs greatly assist in the work of reduction, by allowing the free admission of the pulp between the mullers and discs, so that the pulp is made to actually work upon itself—as the dust of the diamond is made to reduce the gem itself. The advantage derived of thus avoiding all trituration in the presence of quicksilver, must be apparent to any one at all acquainted with gold or silver amalgamation.

Trials made with this machine in the presence of experts, during the last six months, have been pronounced highly satisfactory. It is peculiarly well adapted to employment by small mining operators in distant localities, as it can readily be taken to pieces and packed upon mules.

A large size machine is constructed without dies or mullers, but simply with arms to act as stirrers, to be used in connection with several of the Amalgamators as a "Separator," as it is found that the peculiar motion given to these arms, in connection with the concave shape of the body of the machine, renders it most effectual for such a purpose.

THE WEEK'S DESPATCHES.

THE telegraphic news of the week is important. The "agreement" between Gen. Sherman and Johnson not having met the approval of the President and Cabinet, military operations have been resumed. In another column the terms proposed and the reasons for their rejection are given in full. The report of the death of Assassin Booth will be received with mingled emotions—joy that the miserable hound has been hunted down, regret that he could not have been taken alive and executed in a manner befitting his dastardly deed and better calculated to impress upon traitors and assassins the lesson of his infamy and of the retributive justice of an outraged nation.

The Herald's correspondent says the paroling of Lee's army was completed April 13th. Official reports put the number of men at 26,115, with fifty-nine pieces of artillery, seventy-one stand of colors, 15,918 stand of small arms, 1,100 wagons, caissons, etc., and 400 horses and mules.

Colton Greene son-in-law of Father Ritchie, has been arrested on charge of complicity in the late conspiracy.

The Tribune learns from a passenger from Charleston that just as the steamer left, a report came that the expedition under Potter to Sumterville and Manchester destroyed all the railroad bridges between Columbia and Florence. One thousand bales of cotton, three locomotives and thirteen passenger cars were brought in, and 2,500 liberated slaves.

The entire population of Memphis turned out on the 19th to testify their respect for the President, and fully 20,000 participated, including the enrolled militia and all Federal troops, civic societies, etc.

A despatch just received from Lieut.-General Grant, dated Raleigh, 10 A. M., the 24th, says: "I reached here this morning, and delivered to Gen. Sherman the reply to negotiations with Gen. Johnston, which was immediately sent to Johnston, terminating the truce, and information that civil matters could not be entertained in any convention between the army commanders."

The Tribune's Army of the Potomac special despatch of the 22d says the Sixth Corps was put on the march this morning for Danville, in order to hold that point and guard communication with the army under Gen. Sherman.

The Tribune's Washington despatch says when the whole history of the plot of the late assassination is made public, the world will be astonished at its enormity as well as at our forbearance with our Canadian neighbors, who have constantly furnished a safe asylum to most of the nefarious villains.

J. Wilkes Booth, the assassin, fled into Maryland, in company with an accomplice named Harrold. They were pursued, and took refuge in a barn: the barn was set on fire by the enraged soldiery, and while endeavoring to escape from the flames, Booth was shot and killed. Harrold was taken prisoner and brought to Washington.

A man named Paine was arrested as being the person who attempted the life of Seward. On the 25th, Paine tried to commit suicide by butting his head against the walls of his prison.

A correspondent of the New York Herald gives the following account of the operations of Wilson's cavalry:

The first resistance met by Gen. Wilson's troops was at Monticello, where, after a short fight, Roddy was routed. He retreated skirmishing for about twenty-seven miles, when, on the 1st inst., having formed a junction with Forrest, Lyon and Chalmers, the first-named took command and made a stand, but was driven again with a loss of 100 killed and wounded, and over 200 prisoners and three pieces of artillery. They then retreated to Selma, where, behind very strong works, an obstinate defence was prepared for the next day. Gen. Wilson moved for the attack. After hours of severe fighting, the fortifications were carried by assault, and his troops entered the town, capturing over 2,000 prisoners, 100 cannon, a large number of horses, mules, and immense quantities of supplies and ammunition. Besides these, Gen. Wilson took possession of a million dollars worth of cotton, a large arsenal, the naval iron-works and other manufactories, which, together with many buildings belonging to prominent rebels were destroyed.

On the recent introduction of the electric telegraph into Morocco, notwithstanding the opposition of the fanatics, the Emperor of that country threatened with execution any person who should injure the apparatus. The wires having been recently destroyed by the inhabitants of Mahorany, the village was, by his Majesty's order, surrounded, and the heads of ten of the natives were cut off and fixed on the telegraph poles as a warning. This summary punishment is declared to have produced a great impression upon the people.

Queen Victoria, a few Sundays ago, had a most miraculous escape from being crushed to death by the falling of a huge elm tree in the Home Park. Her Majesty was taking an airing on her favorite Scotch pony, and proceeding through the tall avenue of elm trees at Windsor known as Queen Elizabeth's ride, a groom following at a short distance, when, providentially, the groom observed one of the trees falling immediately over her Majesty. The man called out loudly, and her Majesty, made aware of the danger by this timely alarm, escaped being crushed beneath the tree by a few yards only.

INTERIOR ITEMS.

John O'Laughlin fell into a shaft thirty feet in depth at Grass Valley, recently, and broke both his legs.

Peter Kaull, a native of Prussia, aged forty-four years committed suicide, a few days since, near Kentucky Ranch.

The late heavy frosts have seriously damaged fruit prospects in Butte county.

H. B. Hawkins, Esq., one of the editors of the Gold Hill News, has been appointed Consul at Tumbes, Peru.

The Original Williams & Kellinger claim furnished fifty tons of rock, recently, which yielded $1,538, nearly $32 per ton.

The Oregon Statesman ascertains from the books of the Controller that the total taxable property of that State is $22,188,500.

Griffith Thomas was washed down the tunnel of the Fillibuster Company, at Moore's Flat, by a rush of water which caused a dam to give way, and was instantly killed.

We have now ten Territories waiting to be made States, viz: Wyoming, Colorado, Arizona, Idaho, Montana, Nebraska, New Mexico, Utah and Washington.

The Union men of Washington Territory have nominated Arthur A. Denny as their candidate for Congressional Delegate. He is at present Register of the United States Land Office at Olympia.

The Auburn Herald says the Chinese have presented the citizens of Stewart's Flat with a National flag as a token of their appreciation of their good will in protecting them from the highwaymen who have recently infested that portion of the country.

The body of M. J. Ragan was found in Humboldt county, Nevada, pierced with two rifle balls and several arrows. The murder is supposed to have been the work of white men, and to have been done for money, as when last seen alive he had a thousand dollars on his person.

Gov. Low has appointed Jerome Madden to fill the vacancy occasioned by the expiration of the term for which Stratton was elected as State Librarian. The new appointee has filed his bond and made a formal demand for the office, which was refused. A writ of quo warranto has issued.

Jacob Shellhorn, alias "Barley Jake," exulted over the assassination of President Lincoln, when the news was first received in Silver City, Nevada, for which he was compelled to flee the place, leaving behind him about $7,000 worth of property, which was taken charge of by the loyal citizens.

At the municipal election held in Placerville on the 19th inst., William Jones was elected Mayor; S. J. Ensminger, Marshal; Peter R. Brennan, Clerk; J. D. Burton, W. W. Thatcher, F. F. Barss, J. W. Cullen, Thomas Fraser, B. F. Murray, J. D. Middleton, J. D. Brunson, L. Spencer, G. W. Stout, Aldermen.

Sylvester Marshall, an old resident of Sacramento, and formerly sheriff of the county, has been so much affected by the news of the assassination as to become insane. He imagines that he killed President Lincoln, or that he is accused of having killed him. The unfortunate man has been sent to the Asylum.

Mrs. Florence M. Harlan, of Sacramento, disappeared from her home on the 22d inst., and has not since been heard from. Mrs. H. is the daughter of Mrs. Keyes, and is not quite seventeen years of age. Her husband was one of the sufferers by the Washoe disaster, and present and prospective poverty, it is said, preyed upon her mind. Her friends are deeply distressed on account of her absence.

At Green Valley, in Solano county, a number of secessionists collected, upon the reception of the news of the murder of the President and uttered expressions of fiendish joy. The military authorities at Benicia were notified of what was going on, and a company was sent to suppress the traitorous demonstrations. Upon the arrival of the troops, the ringleaders fortified themselves in the house of David James, in the upper part of the valley. As the troops approached the premises they were fired upon, and two of the soldiers wounded. The fire was returned, and two of the traitors were wounded, when the whole secession party surrendered, and were brought to Benicia next morning. The prisoners are: David James and two sons, William P. Durbin and son, Charles Ramsey and son, A. O. Laramee and son, and John Stultz.

The following persons have been arrested in Colusa county charged with having rejoiced at the assassination of President Lincoln: D. Sheppardson, District Attorney; A. P. Scroggins, Justice of the Peace; Charles Price, Deputy Assessor and Military Poll Tax Collector; W. Goodwin, ex-Confederate soldier; Jonas Beard and J. Campbell. The party were marched down the west side of the Sacramento, and entered the city by way of the Yolo bridge. They were placed under guard at Camp Union. Subsequently three more captures were made, viz: Jonas Baer, blacksmith; M. Goodman, ex-saloon keeper; Mr. O'Neil, ranchman. Six of the Colusa prisoners, and also Peter Miller, arrested in El Dorado county on a like charge, were brought down on the 19th inst., to be taken to Fort Alcatraz.

PEOPLE'S NOMINATING COMMITTEE FOR 1865-6.

CITIZENS OF SAN FRANCISCO: In accordance with your request, the People's Committee of 1863 and 1864 have met together and chosen a Committee for 1865.

At about the close of our Conventional labors, the appalling news of the assassination of the President of the United States reached us; our address to you was prepared, but the terrible news of our loss indicated that a special meeting should be held, expression of our feelings adopted, our address changed to suit the occasion, and that our whole work might be rigidly inspected before the names of the new Committee were offered to the public. In selecting a Committee we have most thoroughly investigated and tested the loyalty of every nominee, in addition to which we have exacted from each member the following oath:

"Do you solemnly swear that you have faithfully supported the Administration since March 4th, 1861, by word, deed and action, and that you have not uttered a word, or harbored a thought, which was or could be prejudicial to the welfare of the Government of the United States, and that you voted for Abraham Lincoln and Andrew Johnson last November?"

We have aimed to select from different classes of citizens those known for their intelligence, worth and general fitness, and who from their antecedents we know have the welfare of the community at heart; who have no selfish or personal schemes in view, no friends to favor or enemies to punish. Our system of reform has been so thoroughly established that, strange as it may appear, our example is having a large and beneficial influence upon cities whose years of experience should have entitled them to homage they have failed to earn.

We trust the names we now present to the public will meet with its cordial approval, having full faith that as a Committee they will nominate none for office but those unquestionably loyal, and in all respects can claim the admiration and respect of all good citizens.

The close approach of election day is our only apology for appearing before the public at a time when every heart is full of sorrow, the city and nation stricken with grief, and when the emblems of mourning, with every word and movement, should be dedicated to an observance of the Nation's calamity.

WASHINGTON FIRE INSURANCE COMPANY OF NEW YORK, BIGELOW & BROTHER, AGENTS.—We call attention to the dividend of this Company, advertised in another column. Besides their regular semi-annual dividend to stockholders, they declare a fourth consecutive scrip dividend of sixty per cent. to their participating insurers. The Atlas of Thursday last says:

"These returns must be very satisfactory to their customers. We understand that about two hundred and fifty pieces are just received by Bigelow & Brother, for distribution—not had to take in this kind of fire. This Company was organized in 1830, with a capital of $200,000, and in 1860 they increased it to $400,000, adopted the participation system, with the motto, 'The Safest and Cheapest System of Insurance,' and added to their fire business the risks of inland navigation and transportation. Since then the Company has not only paid its losses and expenses, but has returned to its stockholders $250,000 in cash, and to its participating customers $175,000 in scrip. When the scrip fund reaches $200,000, the first issue will be redeemed. The holders of the scrip may, therefore, expect the Company to commence redeeming it next year. We think these results prove the truth of the Company's motto, quoted above."

Our friend Mr. William B. Bradbury makes pianos that are equal to the best in the world. We have had one of them in our own house for several years, and for richness and brilliancy of tone, it is such a piano as is not excelled by any that we have ever heard. Its tones are more perfect now than when it was new, which is a good deal more than can be said of most pianos that have had years' faithful use.—Ed. N. Y. Examiner.

Messrs. Hoogs & Madison contemplate holding weekly auction-sales of real estate at their new locality, so soon as arrangements can be completed.

THE next Opposition steamer, the America, sails on May 13th.

A correspondent with the army before Petersburg tells a curious story of a large pine tree, which has long stood midway between the Union and rebel pickets, at a point where the rebel lines are only twenty-five yards apart. The tree's neutral position long protected it from destruction, but the scarcity of fuel suggested a compromise, and it was agreed that it should be cut down, and that both claimants should divide its wood. A delegate from each picket-line accordingly went forth to the task, and by the vigorous axes of both the trunk was soon levelled to the earth. Then arose an animated debate as to which of the soldiers should have the butt and which the branches. Words were not conclusive enough to decide the question, and were soon changed to blows. A brisk and bloodless combat ensued, in which the Union man proved the most skillful pugilist, and the victor triumphantly carried to his camp-fire the largest end of the log.

U. S. 7-30 LOAN.

BY AUTHORITY OF THE SECRETARY OF THE Treasury, the undersigned has assumed the General Subscription Agency for the sale of United States Treasury Notes, bearing seven and three-tenths per cent. interest, per annum, known as the

SEVEN-THIRTY LOAN.

These Notes are issued under date of June 15th, 1865, and are payable three years from that time, in currency or are convertible, at the option of the holder, into

U. S. 5-20 SIX PER CENT.

GOLD BEARING BONDS.

These bonds are now worth a premium of nine per cent. including gold interest from November, which makes the actual profit on the 7-30 loan at current rates, including interest, about ten per cent. per annum, besides its EXEMPTION FROM STATE AND MUNICIPAL TAXATION, which adds FROM ONE TO THREE PER CENT. MORE, according to the rate levied on other property. The interest is payable in currency, semi-annually, by coupons attached to each note, which may be cut off and sold to any bank or banker.

The interest amounts to

One cent. per day on a $50 note.
Two cents " " $100 "
Ten " " $500 "
20 " " $1,000 "
$1 " " $5,000 "

Notes of all denominations named will be promptly furnished upon receipt of subscriptions. This is now offered by the Government, and it is confidently expected that its superior advantages will make it the great Popular Loan of the People.

THE ONLY LOAN IN MARKET

Less than $300,000,000 of the loan authorized by the last Congress, are now on the market.

This amount, at the rate of which it is being absorbed, will all be subscribed for within four months, when the notes will undoubtedly command a premium, as has uniformly been the case on closing the subscriptions to other Loans.

In order that citizens of every town and section of the country may be afforded facilities for taking the loan, the National Bank, State Banks, and Private Bankers throughout the country have generally agreed to receive subscriptions. Subscribers will select their own agents, in whom they have confidence, and who only are to be responsible for the delivery of the notes for which they receive orders.

ALLEN'S

LUNG BALSAM!

THE REMEDY FOR CURING

CONSUMPTION, COUGHS, COLDS,

ASTHMA, CROUP,

DISEASES OF THE THROAT, BRONCHITIS,

Pains and Oppression of the Chest or Lungs,

DIFFICULT BREATHING,

AND ALL THE

DISEASES OF THE PULMONARY ORGANS.

ITS ACTION IS EXPECTORANT, ALTERATIVE, SUDORIFIC, SEDATIVE, DIAPHORETIC and DIURETIC, which renders it one of the most valuable remedies known for curing diseases of the lungs. It excites expectoration, and causes the lungs to throw off the phlegm or mucus, changes the secretions and PURIFIES THE BLOOD; heals the irritated parts; gives strength to the digestive system, brings the liver to its proper action, and imparts, beyond the possibility of doubt, strength to the whole system. Such is the immediate and satisfactory effect, that it is warranted to break up the most distressing cough in a few hours' time, if not of too long standing. It is warranted to give entire satisfaction even in the most confirmed cases of Consumption. It is warranted not to produce costiveness, which is the case with most remedies, or affect the head, as it contains no Opium in any form. It is warranted to be perfectly harmless to the most delicate child, although it is an active and powerful remedy for restoring the system. There is no real necessity for so many deaths by Consumption, when ALLEN'S LUNG BALSAM will prevent it, if only taken in time.

F. MCCOPPIN, Superintendent

AN IRISH START.

IT was market-day at Tralee, and we had great difficulty in getting through the streets, so great was the concourse of people, carts, horses, geese, turkeys, and pigs.

And now, after having passed in safety through many Irish towns on market-days, and started with a great variety of horses and post-boys, I, the most timid and nervous of all foolish women, would address a few words of encouragement to those who may happen to be placed in the like predicaments, with the same feelings of fear.

Never be afraid of an Irish start, even if the leaders come quite round to the carriage door. Never be afraid of having your carriage smashed, even if the narrow street of a little town be (as it generally is) so full of cars, people, pigs, poultry, and horses, that you cannot see the remotest possibility of a passage being obtained for the carriage through the dense mass. Do not be afraid either for yourself, or that any of the swarming population will be run over. The cars, the people, the pigs, etc., will indeed remain in the way, till the leaders which draw your carriage actually touch them. The whole scene looks in most dreadful confusion. The horses rear—the post-boys look as if they could not keep their seats, and had not the least power over the restive horses. The populace halloo, the pigs squeak, the jingle-men vociferated in Irish—jabbering it quicker and more vehemently than ever. But again I say it—do not be in the least afraid, for no accident ever happens.

There seems, indeed, a peculiar providence over Irish drivers, horses, and all the noisy occupants of a crowded street. Drunken men reel about on foot and on horseback, without ever seeming to do themselves or others any harm. At Bandon, I recollect seeing a drunken man gallop down the steep street, and as the horse turned short round at the bottom of it, the rider precipitated off upon his head; but he very deliberately got up again, and endeavored to lead his horse away by the tail!

There does in reality seem a special providence expressly provided for Irish men, women, and children, without which, what with fires, floods, burnings, house-fallings, car-upsettings, etc., there would not be a whole bone in the island. "I have been doing my best to drive over a child in this town for the last eight-and-twenty years," said an English mail-coach driver to his friend on the box, "and never could do it!" The risks that are run, the hazards encountered in every excursion by land or by water by these dare-devil people, would astonish and terrify their more civilized and cautious neighbors. At the top of one of the steepest mountain-roads in the west of Ireland, Lord Guillemore stopped the driver of the chaise he was seated in, proclaiming his intention to walk it down rather than proceed in the carriage—the rather as one of the horses, a young, long-tailed chestnut, had given, on the level road, some very unequivocal signs of hot temper and unsteadiness.

"I'd rather get out here," said the Chief Baron.

"Anan!" said the postillion, purposely turning a deaf ear to what he conceived a slur upon his coachmanship.

"I'll get down—open the door, my man," reiterated his lordship.

"True for ye, it's a fine bit of road, yer honor," said the incorrigible fellow, still pretending to mistake what was said, and all the while approaching slowly and insidiously to the verge of the hill. "Now, honld fast," said the wretch, as he laid the lash first over one, then over the other of his horses, and set off down the mountain at a most furious pace. The horses both flying out at either side from the pole, and the chaise spinning and bumping through ruts and over stones that every minute threatened annihilation—the long-tailed chestnut contriving, even in his top speed, to show both his hind hoofs very near the judge's nose as he sat in the chaise, the postillion springing with wonderful agility from one side to the other, to avoid kicks that threatened every instant to smash his skull. Down they went, the pace increasing, the windows broken by the concussion, and one door flung wide open, and increasing by its banging noise the confusion of the scene. The road terminated at the foot of the mountain in a narrow bridge that led off at a very sharp angle from the line; and here the terrified judge expected as inevitable the fate that he had hitherto by miracles escaped. Down they came, the hot chestnut, now half mad from excitement, springing four or five feet every bound, and dragging along the other horse at the most terrific rate. They reached the bridge—round went the chaise on two wheels, and in a moment more they pulled up in safety on the opposite side, both the horses being driven, collar-up, into a quickset hedge. Before the Chief Baron had time to speak, the fellow was down mending the harness with a piece of cord, as leisurely as if nothing remarkable had happened.

"Tell me, my fine fellow," said his lordship, "was that chestnut ever in harness before?"

"Never, my lord; but the master says he'll give eight pounds for her if she'd bring your lordship down this bit of Sliev-na-muck, without breaking the chaise or doing ye any harm."—Lady Chatterton's Rambles in Ireland.

TRIBUTE OF CHIEF JUSTICE SANDERSON.

THE tributes called forth by the announcement of the death of President Lincoln have in many instances been eloquent and affecting, but the response of Chief Justice Sanderson of the Supreme Court of California, to the motion of the Attorney General that the Court adjourn as a mark of respect, is the most fitting, just and happily-worded of any we have read. It appears in the Union of April 22d; we transfer it to our columns with a feeling of pride and pleasure that the chief of our judiciary may be quoted anywhere with credit to himself and California:

The motion which has been made is eminently proper and will be allowed. A great calamity has befallen the nation, and millions of hearts are smitten with the profoundest grief. In the death of Abraham Lincoln the country has not only been deprived of its chief executive officer, but the cause of liberty throughout the world has sustained an irreparable loss. While it may not be claimed by some that he was the greatest man of his day, in the sense in which that term is popularly understood none will deny but that he was the noblest and the best. In all the elements which constitute greatness of heart he had no superior, and few, if any, peers. His fervid patriotism, his love of freedom and his devotion to the cause of his country in her hours of danger have been unequalled, if not unrivaled, by any whom these troublous times have brought to the charge of public affairs. As we review the history of the past four years and note his acts and sayings during the bloody contest which has waged between treason upon the one hand and the Constitution and the Government on the other, we cannot fail to be impressed with the conviction that his selection to preside over public affairs at such a crisis was more the result of a Providential foreseeing will than the blind choice of man. He was possessed of an unbounded love for the form of Government which he was called upon to administer. He cherished the Union as the only medium through which the principles of that Government could be perpetuated and its manifold blessings continued. He was also endowed with a sleepless prudence and that clearness of judgment which no prejudice could blind—with that calm temper which no combination of circumstances could ruffle, and that love of truth and justice which constitutes a safeguard against the approaches of wrong. These traits were indispensable to the character of him upon whom was devolved the duty of upholding the Constitution and maintaining the integrity of the Republic during a rebellion unparalleled in history; and it has been fortunate and well for the country that they entered so largely into the character of Lincoln. Guided by them he was enabled, while he lived, so to manage and conduct public affairs as to preserve peace and continued prosperity in those sections of the country which remained faithful to the Union, and at the same time wage most effective war against that which had become disaffected, until finally the rebellion had become stripped of its gigantic proportions and well nigh ended.

It has been charged by his political opponents that Lincoln was a partisan and sectional President. Against this charge history will vindicate his memory. He entered upon the exercise of his official functions in no partisan or sectional spirit, but with a full purpose, oft-repeated on his way to the seat of Government, to uphold the Constitution as he found it, to respect its compromises and to administer the laws entrusted to his execution with equal and exact justice to all sections. In concern for the universal good of the people—in desire to avoid sectional strife and to preserve intact the integrity of the republic, history will accord to him a place by the side of the Father of his Country, notwithstanding the partisan calumnies of the day. True he was hostile to the institution of slavery because he believed it to be a great moral, social and political evil, a relic of barbarism disgraceful to the civilization of the nineteenth century and repugnant to the spirit of a Government which had self-government for its leading idea, and recognized freedom as its corner stone. But he did not propose its overthrow by other than constitutional means. That he would have given his sanction, had no rebellion intervened, to measures within the Constitution calculated to prevent its extension, there can be no doubt, and it is equally true that he would not have given his sanction to more ulterior measures, but would have kept strictly within the limits of the Constitution, and left the final extinction of slavery, for which he prayed, to time and the attrition of moral forces. When, after a year and a half of nearly fruitless war, he found it necessary, in order to suppress the rebellion and vindicate an outraged Government and a violated Constitution, to strike at the institution of slavery, he did so not as the Chief Civil Magistrate of the nation, but as the Commander-in-Chief of the Army and Navy, acting under and by virtue of the laws of war.

"Whom the gods wish to destroy they first make mad." It may be that Providence, in His infinite wisdom, ordained that this rebellion should take place in order that all constitutional obstacles to the extinction of slavery might be removed. It may be that a year and a half of war, during which no blow was aimed at the manacles of the slave, was made fruitless in order that his freedom might become a necessity. If so, the result designed was accomplished on the first day of January, 1863. Although regarded by many of his friends as a measure of doubtful legality and policy, Mr. Lincoln, the lawyer and statesman, at once saw and pointed out the grounds upon which, in his judgment, the legality of his Emancipation Proclamation could be sustained, and his wisdom foresaw the soundness of its policy which subsequent events have demonstrated. The first of January, 1863, has become like the Fourth of July, 1776, an epoch in American history, and the Proclamation of Freedom, then issued as a military necessity, will live side by side with the Magna Charta of English liberty and the Declaration of American Independence. From that time the crushing of the rebellion was made certain, and the restoration of the Union, without the stain of slavery upon it, was made sure.

If it was within the Divine plan that Lincoln should be made a martyr to the cause of his country—if his death was necessary, as it may have been, in order to accomplish some great design of Providence—though we may mourn his loss, we should not repine at the sacrifice. In the midst of our grief we must remember that God is just, and that if the life of Abraham Lincoln had been longer necessary to the Republic, it doubtless would have been spared. He lived long enough to achieve a name as lasting as time, and died before a stain could attach to his memory.

"His life was gentle, and the elements
So mixed in him that nature might stand up
And say to all the world, 'This was a man.'"

When great and good men leave us, it is fitting that we should pause from our daily avocations and pay a tribute of respect to their memories. But while we deplore their loss we should be hopeful of the future, and remember that "behind the cloud the sun shines still."

THE DEVIL'S ILLNESS.

A FRAGMENT FROM CHARLES LAMB.

THE Devil was sick and queasy of late,
And his sleep and his appetite failed him;
His ears they hung down: and his tail it was clapped
Between his poor hoofs, like a dog that's been rapped
None knew what the devil ailed him.

He tumbled and tossed on his mattress o' nights,
That was fit for a fiend's disport;
For 'twas made of the finest of thistle and thorn.
Which Alecto herself had gathered, in scorn
Of the best down-beds that are mortal.

His giantly chest in earthquakes heaved,
With groanings corresponding;
And mining and few were the words he spoke,
While a sigh like some delicate whirlwind broke
From a heart that seemed desponding.

Now the Devil an old wife had for his dam;
I think none e'er was older;
Her years—old Parr's were nothing to them;
And a chicken to her was Methusalem.
You'd say, could you behold her.

She remembered Chaos, a little child,
Strumming upon hand-organs;
At the birth of old Night, a gossip she sat,
The ancientest there: and was godmother at
The christening of the Gorgons.

Her bones peeped through a rhinoceros's skin,
Like a mummy through its cerement;
But she had a mother's heart, and guessed
What pinched her son, whom she thus addressed
In terms that bespoke endearment:

"What ails my Nicky, my darling imp,
My Lucifer bright, my Beetle?
My pig, my pug-with-a-curly-tail,
You are not well: can a mother fail
To see that which all hell see?"

"O mother dear! I am dying, I fear:
Prepare the yew and the willow,
And the cypress black; for I get up no ease,
By day or by night, for the cursed fleas
That skip about my pillow."

"Your pillow is clean, and your pillow-beer,
For I washed 'em in Styx last night, son;
And your blankets both, and dried them upon
The himintony banks of Acheron:
It is not the fleas that bite, son.

I wish my Nicky is not in love."
"O mother, you have nicked it!"
And he turned his head aside with a blush;
Not red-hot pokers or crimson plush
Could half so deep have pricked it.

HINTS TO DANCERS.—We go to a ball. Mercy upon us! is this what you call dancing? A man of thirty years of age, and with legs as thick as a gate-post, stands up in the middle of the room, and gapes and fumbles with his gloves, looking all the time as if he were burying his grandmother. At a given signal, the unwieldy animal puts himself into motion; he throws out his arms, crouches up his shoulders, and, without moving a muscle of his face, kicks up his legs, to the manifest risk of the bystanders, and goes back to his place puffing and blowing like an otter, after a half-hour's burst. Is this dancing? Shades of the filial and paternal Vestris! can this be a specimen of the art which gives elasticity to the most inert conformation, which sets the blood glowing with a warm and genial flow, and makes beauty float before our ravished senses, stealing our admiration by the gracefulness of each new motion, till at last our soul thrills to each warning movement, and dissolves into ecstasy and love? Maiden, with the roses lying among the twinings of thy long red hair, think not that the art of dancing consists merely in activity and strength. Thy limbs, which are none of the weakest, were not intended to be rivals with a pavior's hammer; the artificer who trimmed thy locks had no idea that his labors were to be lifted three feet higher than thy natural height from the ground; spare thyself such dreadful exertion, we beseech thee, and consider that thine ankle, though strong and thick as St. George's pillars, may still be broken or sprained with such saltations.—Blackwood's Magazine.

ALAMEDA PARK HOTEL.

This new and elegant House will be opened for the reception of guests, on SATURDAY, the 18th instant. It is situated on the Alameda Encinal, within three minutes' walk of the San Leandro Railway, and three miles from the end of the wharf, between which and the foot of Broadway, steamers ply at frequent intervals during the day. The hotel can be reached by boat and rail, in forty minutes from Montgomery street. The location is in the midst of a dense grove, and, as a suburban resort, cannot be surpassed for beauty and healthfulness. This hotel is splendidly fitted up with all the modern improvements, and in every respect will be conducted as a first class public house. The proprietor would call especial attention of families to the attractiveness of this locality, so accessible, and yet retired, and free from the turmoil of the city. Bowling Alleys, Billiard rooms, and all of the leading journals of the day will be at the disposal of visitors, while the sportsman can find an abundance of wild game in the vicinity of the hotel. THE WILLOWS!

The HOTEL of this popular and fashionable place of public resort was opened to the public on SUNDAY, the 24 of April, 1865; also the grounds were thrown open to those who wish to spend a few hours of recreation and pleasure; also the Lodging Apartments, Restaurants, and Ladies' Refreshment Saloon, will be in readiness for occupancy.

The Shooting Gallery, Ten-Pin Alleys, and Shuffle Boards have been replaced, and are now ready for public patronage, as well as the Flying Horses for Children, which are now in readiness to perform daily duty.

Ample Stabling is attached to the premises, attended by polite and watchful grooms.

The THEATRE has been newly decorated, and rendered more comfortable for public use, in which there will be a grand Instrumental Concert every Sunday Afternoon to be followed by a GRAND BALL.

The Grounds are thrown open to Military Companies, as well as for Schools, for Picnics, Military Parades, etc. The Restaurant and Refreshment Saloons will be under the charge of WIMMER, the celebrated Caterer.

The Bars will be stocked with all the best brands of LIQUORS and WINES, and nothing will be left undone to make the WILLOWS the grandest place of resort on the Pacific Coast. The Proprietors hope, by reason of experience and strict attention to the comforts of their guests, to secure a share of the patronage of the public.

North Beach and Mission Railroad Company Cars leave the corner of Montgomery and California streets every eight minutes for the Willows.

Programmes and Posters will be distributed throughout the city for Saturday and Sunday Performances.

DR. WISTAR'S BALSAM

—OF—

WILD CHERRY,

HAS BEEN USED FOR

NEARLY HALF A CENTURY,

With the most astonishing success in curing

Coughs, Colds, Hoarseness, Sore Throat, Influenza, Whooping Cough, Croup, Liver Complaint, Bronchitis, Difficulty of Breathing, Asthma, and every Affection of

The Throat, Lungs and Chest,

INCLUDING EVEN

CONSUMPTION.

There is scarcely one individual in the community who wholly escapes, during a season, from some one, however slightly developed, of the above symptoms—a neglect of which might lead to the last-named and most to be dreaded disease in the whole catalogue. The power of the "medicinal gum" of the Wild Cherry Tree over this class of complaints is well known; so great is the good it has performed, and so great too popularity it has acquired.

In this preparation, besides the virtues of the Cherry, there are commingled with it other ingredients of like value, thus increasing its value tenfold, and forming a Remedy whose power to soothe, to heal, to relieve, and to cure disease, exists in no other medicine yet discovered.

The unequalled success that has attended the application of this medicine in all cases of

PULMONARY COMPLAINTS

has induced many physicians of high standing to employ it in their practice, some of whom advise us of the fact under their own signatures. We have space only for the names of a few of these:

S. H. Finley, M. D., San Francisco, Cal.

E. Doyden, M. D., Exeter, Me.

Alexander Hatch, M. D., China, Mo.

R. Fellows, M. D., Hill, N. H.

W. H. Webb, M. D., Cape Vincent, N. Y.

W. B. Lynch, M. D., Auburn, N. Y.

Abraham Skillman, M. D., Boundbrook, N. J.

H. D. Martin, M. D., Mansfield, Pa.

The proprietors have letters from all classes of our fellow-citizens, from the Halls of Congress to the humblest cottage, and even from beyond the seas; for the fame and virtues of WISTAR'S BALSAM have extended to the "utmost bounds of the earth," without any attempt on our part to introduce it beyond the limits of our own country.

TO CALIFORNIANS AND OREGONIANS.

In futuro all genuine WISTAR'S BALSAM OF WILD CHERRY for the Pacific Coast will be enclosed in a new wrapper which will bear the printed names of both SETH W. FOWLE & CO., Boston, Mass. and JOHN D. PARK, Cincinnati, Ohio, as well as fac-simile of the signatures of "I. BUTTS," "SANFORD & PARK," and "H. WISTAR, M. D."

HAMLET—Act III., Scene 2.

AMERICA is professedly a Christian country, yet if we are to be judged by the evidences which appear in our public prints we fear foreigners will scarcely consider our claim to the title of a Christian nation a very strong one. Our newspapers are filled with fearfully irreverent—almost blasphemous—expressions; the Deity is not, perhaps, actually ignored, but there is a general disposition to exalt the achievements of our own strong arm rather than to confess our thankfulness to God, through whom we gained the victory. A specimen of this style of writing appeared in the Bulletin of Thursday:

"But this 'great Empire' is not shattered into numberless fragments, thanks to God, and Lincoln, and Grant, and the army, and the loyal people everywhere within its borders."

Here we see the Almighty, Lincoln, Grant and the people of the United States coupled together by conjunctions as equal powers through whose workings a great end has been attained. We should be sorry to have people believe that a republican form of government is antagonistic to Christianity, yet such an inference might justly be drawn from the desire evinced by our newspapers to claim equality with the great Ruler of the Universe. The same shocking irreverence for sacred names and things is shown in many of the tributes to the memory of the great man who has fallen among us which have been published in the daily and weekly newspapers of this State. The Golden Era has appeared especially ambitious of proving how reckless it can be in this respect. In one of the poems on the death of President Lincoln, which it published immediately after that fearful calamity had befallen the nation, the line, "Now he's a God!" is repeated again and again. In mentioning the gods of heathen mythology, it is not customary to commence the word "god" with a capital letter, that distinction being reserved for the one and only true God. In another part of the same paper we find the late President Lincoln styled "The Prince of Peace." This blasphemous use of holy names when speaking of a mortal is shocking to those who profess the Christian religion, and we grieve that it should occur in papers which are unhesitatingly admitted into families, under the supposition that nothing can at any time be found in their columns which would have a tendency to corrupt the tender minds of youth.

The Alta is very unfortunate when it wishes to praise. It generally makes some stupid blunder which destroys the effect of what it says. Puck, the comic paper and Pacific pictorial, publishes in its number for May a beautiful lithographic drawing by Charles Nahl, from a design by Pascal Loomis, in which Columbia is represented weeping at the tomb of Lincoln; in the foreground lies the monster Rebellion slain, and in the background a figure of Peace with a palm in her hand is represented appearing through the clouds. The Alta says Columbia is weeping at the tomb, "while Fame inscribes his name above," evidently mistaking the palm leaf for a quill pen—perhaps the eagle quill with which the editor of the Alta penned his wonderful leader on the glorious news of the surrender of Richmond. If the design had been intended to represent any such operation, the artist would, we should imagine, have given Fame something more substantial than clouds to write upon. We suppose the editor of the Alta is the only man who was not able at a glance to discover and fully comprehend the design of this beautiful work of art.

Infelix FELIX O'BYRNE! The Bulletin of Thursday devotes a column to proving that the unhappy Quartermaster ought to be hanged, drawn and quartered—or at least suspended from his duties, prevented from drawing his pay, and quartered in Alcatraz. Oh, Felix! why did you not in Victoria pursue a straightforward course instead of signing your name backwards to secession articles? O'Byrne will be made responsible for the writings of "Enrybo." Your enemies shout "Victoria," and you are defeated. The Bulletin gives a synopsis of the testimonials which Felix received from parties in this city. He has a whole cloud of witnesses to his character "as a gentleman of education, social position and intellect of the highest order." We will not quite endorse this, but we can say that Felix is a gentleman of very social habits—as to intellect and education he has quite enough for a quartermaster. Frank Soule says he is "well educated, intelligent and competent." Oh, Soule, can you say this frankly? Now every one is down on poor Felix we must say a good word for him. Granted that he wrote secession articles while among the John Bulls in Victoria, his doing so was an Irish hull; he didn't mean it, and "shure, hasn't an Irishman leave to spuke twice?" This is the only way in which Felix can save himself—let him take the hull by the horns, defy the Bulletin, say he did write secession articles, but the appointment he has received from the United States Government has converted him; he is a staunch Union man, and the Union party ought to rejoice more over the conversion of the rebel Enrybo than over ninety-and-nine Loyal Hibernian Club O'Byrnes who need no repentance.

We notice an advertisement which must be extremely pleasing to musical men:

WAITER WANTED—For the country. Must be able to play on the piano or violin.

It is a good thing to have learned to labor and to wait—still better to be able to fiddle and to wait. Singing chambermaids are in demand for the stage, harmonious blacksmiths we have heard of, but musical waiters are a novelty. We wonder the advertiser does not also require the waiter to sing—a dumb waiter, however, will suit him if he can only play either the violin or piano. Fancy the musician rushing frantically backward and forward from kitchen to dining-room throughout the day, supplying a square meal to the boarders until his unfortunate pedal extremities ache with fatigue, and in the evening being required to drum music out of a square piano, work the pedals, and transform himself into a Gottschalk. What might not Paul Julien have come to had he waited in San Francisco until the public tired of him! Horrible to think of! He might eventually have waited in the country. We hope, for the sake of the musical profession, the advertiser will not succeed in getting his flunky violinist or pianist. Surely any tolerable performer on the violin can manage to scrape a living in San Francisco and any fair performer on the piano-forte get a good if not a grand living on the square, and not be compelled to banish himself to a cottage in the country and be guilty of the treble baseness of becoming a menial, strumming on the piano to delight bar-room loafers, and scraping a fiddle while country bumpkins dance.

The problem of suspending life by freezing is being tested in Europe. In Switzerland, a female convict who was sentenced to be suspended by the neck, has been handed over to the savants for them to suspend her life by freezing her. She is now enjoying an ice nap. It is rather too bad to make the first experiment on a woman; why not have frozen a man?—tried an iced cobbler, for instance. It is rather a cool way of treating a lady, and if she wakes up we should imagine she would look rather coldly on those who endeavor to thaw her frozen heart. "Hamlet" says to "Ophelia": "Be thou chaste as ice, as pure as snow, thou shalt not escape calumny." We imagine, however, that the Switzer convict during the period she is frozen in ice, will be secure from all the shafts of malice. We trust the experiment may prove successful, and the suspension of life by freezing become a frozen fact.

GEN. McDOWELL, thinking that mercy should not only be "enthroned in the heart of kings," but should be a General virtue, has exercised it in the case of Peter Quivey, arrested in Santa Clara county by Colonel Jackson, on the charge of using treasonable language and exulting over the murder of President Lincoln, and pardoned him "on account of his age, his poverty and his ignorance." With regard to the first circumstance mentioned as extenuating, we consider he was old enough to know better; as to the second, poverty is a poor excuse; the third will make Peter Quivey exclaim: "When ignorance is bliss, 'tis folly to be wise." Let him beware how he offends again. "Let him look to his bond."

We notice in the advertisement of Maguire's Opera House the following announcement: "Will shortly be produced, an entire new farce, entitled My Wife's Maid." We believe this so-called "entire" new farce will, after all, turn out to be only a "piece."

The advertisement of Chief Burke for one hundred able bodied men has, so says the Alta, led to the idea that Chief Burke intended at the head of this formidable body to proceed to Mexico, burk the usurper Maximilian, and maintain the supremacy of the Monroe Doctrine. The Alta states authoritatively, that "Ten thousand men could be raised in the Pacific States to go to Mexico to fight for the cause of Freedom and sustain the Monroe Doctrine without wages." This is no rash assertion; it has grounds on which to found the supposition. No less than seventeen letters have been received on the subject, and a man in the country says that 10,000 men can be raised in the State, for he knows of twenty-five men who are ready to start. We trust the services of this devoted little band of twenty-five who are ready to "sustain the Monroe Doctrine without wages," will be accepted. If Chief Burke is too busy to attend to this little affair, let him send Blitz to lead this gallant army. We trust we shall soon be able to announce that the Emperor Maximilian is safely stowed in the calahoose, awaiting his trial on a charge of misdemeanor.

CALIFORNIA newspapers appear to consider that murders, suicides and other crimes, which in other countries are regarded as serious and shocking events, should be published in an amusing form as good jokes. The Placerville News of May 3d, says:

"On Sunday last, a woman living a short distance from town committed suicide by drinking a large dose of 'cold pizen,' which resulted in her death immediately."

"Cold pizen" is very funny. This sort of thing should be encouraged. When a man cuts his wife's throat, let it be described as "splitting his wife's weazand," suicide by drowning, as "making a hole in the water," and in describing the execution of a criminal, say "after the prisoner fell he looked as if he had taken a drop too much." Our newspapers will thus be rendered very amusing, and foreigners will be able from the perusal of them to form a just estimate of the value set upon human life in the State of California.

We are afraid the Flag, in the following paragraph, has not expressed the meaning it wished to convey in such a manner as to prevent its being misunderstood:

"A gentleman from Petaluma gives a figurative description of the Flag's expulsion of the Alta from Sonoma county. He says 'it reminds him of 'Death on the pale horse,' with all hell following after.'"

Most people would suppose that "Death on a pale horse" standing for the Alta, "hell" stands for the Flag. Perhaps, though, this paper may intend holdly to confess its origin, and acknowledge the "devil" as its editor.

THERE is no doubt about the matter, there is, as has been repeatedly stated by a morning paper, ghosts in this city. As a proof, we present the following advertisement clipped from the Call:

WANTED—Eight practical Working Miners, and ONE MAN TO COOK.

There it is—in large type, "one man to cook." The eight practical working miners are a minor consideration with the advertiser. What he wants is "one man to cook."

The Alta says that Signor Morelli was "a little hoarse" on Wednesday night. We think Signor Morelli is the best horse of the team; his powers of draught surpass those of all the others whom Bianchi has hitched on to his stage, and his action is better and more elevated than that of the other performers.

The editors of the Flag complain that they are subjected to a malicious persecution by the police force of this city. We have heard many complaints of this kind made in the Police Court, but somehow or other those who make them do not gain much sympathy either from the Judge or the public.

THE Monitor is to make its appearance to-day under a new name. We would recommend the Pi-lot as appropriate. TREM.

A FEMALE operative in the Portsmouth Spool Cotton Factory, having become "converted," sent back 18 3-4 dozen spools, saying in a note that her conscience would not allow her to retain it, but she reserved a few spools for her own use, and gave some away to her "most particular friends!" Genuine conversion, that.

An old gentleman named Powell, paralyzed, and only able to move on wheels, who had the question "popped" to him by his nurse, and accepted her, and then backed out of the engagement on advice of his friends, has been ordered by the London courts to pay £2,000 to the lady (a Miss Lewis) for this breach of promise.

THE CONSCRIPT.

BY LAURA PRESTON.

"MOTHER, I must leave you!"

The speaker, a fine-looking young man about twenty-two years old, stood in the doorway of a farm-house looking with restless eyes upon the scene before him. The waters of the Neuse swept onward but a few paces beyond, gliding—a gleam of light—through the dark pine woods and the fields of luxuriant corn that waved with a low rustling sound in the breeze. But the young man saw nothing of this or of the glories of the setting sun, which were illuminating forest and river with its rainbow tints. His mind was entirely engrossed by the news he had just heard. Newbern was threatened by a Federal fleet, and, in common with many others, he had been called upon to act in its defence.

His mother covered her face with her hands, and a shudder passed through her frame as she heard his words. The shock was none the less severe because expected; but presently she looked up proudly and with flashing eyes, and said: "Edward, if need be, you will die as your father did: true to your country to the last!"

"As he did, so will I, mother!" was the ready answer. "But I pray God it may never be beneath the rebel flag! Never will I be the tool of traitors! Never will I lift my hand against the defenders of my country, nor by one act give aid to those who seek its ruin. North Carolina has ever borne a name for loyalty and courage, and I—her son—will show that she is not altogether unworthy of it now!"

Mrs. Langdon heard his words with joy. Hers was a noble heart. From the first murmur of Secession she had raised her voice against it, and by her influence had impelled her husband and son in the course which the hearts of both assured them was the right. Although residents of a locality where disloyalty was openly avowed, they still clung to the sentiments to which they had ever gloried. Soon after the act of Secession was passed, Mr. Langdon, after much provocation, made some remarks, condemning in the strongest terms the baseness of the proceeding, in which he said the people had had no voice, and which, by many of them, was abhorred.

A young man who stood near him, wearing the uniform of a captain of militia, denied the statements made by Mr. Langdon, and accused him of traitorous language and designs.

"Young man," returned Mr. Langdon, calmly fixing his eyes searchingly upon him, "I am no traitor. Those only are traitors who have raised their hands against the Constitution of the United States and wear the livery of rebellion!"

Quick as thought, the young man drew a pistol from his breast and fired. The ball pierced the heart of the noble patriot, and he sank to the earth, one of the first victims of Secession in North Carolina.

He was carried home; but the care of the physician and his distracted wife was unavailing; he breathed his last within twelve hours. His last act was to press a small American flag to his breast and present it to his son, with the words: "Remember that this flag is stained by your father's blood, and that he recommends you to protect it with your own!"

And he did remember it that summer day, as he stood in the doorway, looking over the beautiful scene, darkened only by the curse of anarchy.

"Mother," he said earnestly, "you need not fear for me! I will never cause you a blush. You know that if it had been possible I should long before have joined those with whom are all my hopes and sympathies. How can I do so now? More closely than a blood-bond on my track, Captain Price (his brow darkened as the name of his father's murderer passed his lips) has followed me. Mother, but for you I should have taken vengeance into my own hands months ago!"

"Leave vengeance to the Lord!" said the matron.

He started and turned quickly towards a young girl who had softly approached him.

"Dear Alice," he said, with a look that revealed the deepest, purest love, "dear Alice, the die is cast! I am a rebel conscript—a slave—more ignoble far than those that toil in yonder field without incentive or reward."

The young girl looked upon him tenderly, and replied: "Edward, chains cannot bind the free soul. 'Tis true that we must part. I am weaker than you; still I can bear even this; I have borne scornful words and looks, and I will still struggle on until our cause is triumphant and the Union is restored, firmer and stronger for its trial in the furnace of affliction."

And so those true-hearted women—mother and his promised wife—gave him into the hands of his persecutors, with only their prayers for his defence.

Night and day after the draft was the house watched. Many plans of escape were concocted, but Edward Langdon refused to report to headquarters on the day appointed and was dragged from his home, firm in his resolve to bear every trial with fortitude, and never to lift his hand against his country. With the flag his father's gore had hallowed in his bosom, he went forth to brave his bitterest foes.

He was placed in the camp of instruction at Newbern, and when it became known that he absolutely refused to bear arms or to aid in any way in the prosecution of the war, he was punished by the infliction of every petty torture that malice could invent. When Newbern was in danger of capture, he was sent to Weldon, where he was subjected to even worse usage. He was no longer allowed to communicate with his friends; and, suffering from the deepest anxiety of mind and the want of sufficient food and clothing, he endured with heroic fortitude an imprisonment of nearly eighteen months. During that time he was the victim of many cruelties. One day he was ordered with a party of soldiers to load some hay for Government use which had been taken by impressment from a poor man whose sentiments were in favor of the Union. Langdon refused to engage in the work, and by his denunciations of the act so enraged his companions that with oaths they turned upon him and inflicted many wounds with their bayonets.

Through the month of April he lay in the close, stifling prison, a foul charnel house where scores weekly laid down to die, burning with fever and vainly longing for one breath of pure air, or a draught of cool water. His festering wounds were painful, but not dangerous, and at last his strong constitution triumphed, and he once more arose from his bed of pain; but now came a more severe trial of his fortitude. He was tried by court-martial, pronounced a traitor, and sentenced to be shot. One chance for life was given him; that was, that he would take the oath of allegiance to the Confederate States, and bear arms in their defence. This he firmly refused to, and cheered by the thought that he should die in a good cause, and that his mother and betrothed were under Federal protection, he calmly prepared to meet his doom.

The day on which his sentence was to be carried into effect quickly arrived. With a firmness shaken only by the remembrance of those dear ones from whom he seemed about to be parted forever, he went out to the place to which he had been ordered, and calmly awaited his fate.

It was bitter thus to die, with the soft verdure of May springing beneath his feet and crowning the forest, and with the azure of the cloudless sky above him. He looked around and a deadly faintness overcame him as he thought that he should never more behold this beauty nor the forms of those he loved. A prayer for strength—such a prayer as men only utter in their direst need—ascended from his full heart.

A platoon of soldiers came up with an officer at their head, in whom, to his horror, Edward Langdon recognized his father's murderer, Captain Price.

The chaplain read a portion of scripture, prayed for the doomed man, and then asked the usual question: "Will you renounce your traitorous opinions and designs, and take the oath of allegiance to the Confederate States?"

An expression almost sublime in its fearlessness rested upon his features as he replied, "I will not! Do you think that I would save my body at the risk of my immortal soul?"

Burning with rage and malice, Price waited no longer, but excitedly commanded his men to fire.

They looked at each other with strange meaning in their eyes; then at the prisoner who, with pallid countenance, but a sublime courage in every expression, awaited the messengers of death.

"Fire! fire!" shouted the officer fiercely.

Again the men looked doubtfully at each other; and one said slowly: "Captain, we cannot shoot such a man as that."

Price uttered a fearful oath, and, urging his horse forward, prostrated the prisoner and endeavored in vain to make the animal trample upon him. A by-stander watched his movements with interest, and then with a scornful laugh said:

"It's no use, Captain; that horse has been used to leaping over fallen foes—and running from them, too, I suspect."

A deep crimson suffused the face of the Captain at this remark, for it was well known that in the flight from Newbern he had been among the first to hurry away, and to reach Kinston with the tidings of disaster.

He ordered the men who had refused to obey his command to the guard-house, and rode away discomfited, to report to the commanding general the failure of his plans.

It was soon discovered that a deep sympathy for the young man had spread throughout the brigade, and that it would be dangerous to insist that those to whom he was so well known should act as executioners; so he was sent to Lee's lines to be dealt with according to the discretion of the commander-in-chief.

Extensive preparations were being made for the invasion of Pennsylvania, and, in the rear of the army, Edward Langdon, with a number who shared his opinions, were obliged to march across the Potomac. With the greatest enthusiasm the greater part of the army marched onward to the fray, singing as they crossed the waters:

"I hear the distant thunder's hum;
Maryland! my Maryland!"

The old line's bugle, fife and drum

Maryland! my Maryland!

She is not dead, nor deaf, nor dumb;

She breathes, she burns, she'll come, she'll come—

She who scorns the Northern arm;

Maryland! my Maryland!"

Edward Langdon heard them with contempt.

"The victory is not yet won," he said to a young man, who like himself had suffered long and deeply, "and I firmly believe that soon that song will be heard no more, but flying hosts will shriek the loud refrain,

"Oh, carry me back! oh, carry me back,
To old Virginia shore!"

And so it proved. All through those dreadful days at Gettysburg he remained with the army, witnessing with horror the dreadful carnage. He saw thousands fall, mingling their cries of horror and despair. The booming of cannon and rattle of musketry resounded on every side, and roused his mind to action. Half wild with excitement, he watched the rise and fall of every tide that promised woe or weal to the cause he loved. It seemed impossible that he could longer remain a passive spectator of the scene. With a thrill of delight he seized the weapon which was at last thrust into his hands, and in a moment found himself facing the Northerners who in an unbroken column were advancing to meet them. Langdon saw them approaching with varying emotions. Their first fire might end all his hopes. He had but one protection: his father's flag which was still hidden in his bosom! Quick as thought he drew it forth and placed it on his bayonet, then, with a wild cry raised it aloft.

A hundred bullets from the rear whizzed past him. "I will die rather than haul down the flag!" was his thought, and again he waved it. A cheer from the advancing column of Federals inspired him, an oath fell upon his ears, and, turning he beheld Captain Price, who, drawing a pistol from his belt, fired at him with the cry: "Die, traitor!"

Edward Langdon fell, and the column rushed on to meet the Federals. A deadly faintness came over him as he felt the tread of their hurrying feet and heard the terrible din of battle. A shrill cry of pain for a moment aroused him, and looking up he saw Captain Price fall wounded from his horse. Then he lost consciousness of what was transpiring around him.

The night had settled over the plain when Langdon returned to consciousness. Save the dreadful moans of the wounded, all was silent. The moon shone calmly over the pale faces of hundreds of the dead, and seemed almost to mock the agony of those who still breathed.

With a feeling of horror the young man faintly raised himself up and looked around him. Shooting and burning pains in his shoulder and breast made him aware that he was severely wounded. His clothes were saturated with blood, and, almost fainting, he was compelled again to lie down and wait for morning.

At last it came. Oh, never to those suffering ones was dawn so beautiful! Yet the rising sun revealed a scene of misery past description. Edward Langdon lay amid hundreds of wounded men, listening with pain to their prayers, groans and curses.

"Water! water!" groaned one in most piteous accents.

Langdon shuddered with horror. He knew that voice. His father's murderer—his own bitter foe—lay but a few paces from him.

He lay still for a few moments with his eyes closed, listening to that bitter moan, and struggling with the torturing thoughts that filled his mind.

At last he rose and slowly and painfully approached his enemy. Their eyes met: for a moment Price looked at him with the glare of a serpent, and then cried again in the extremity of his anguish, "Water! water! Langdon, kill me or give me water!"

"I will not kill you, Price," he answered, "although you owe me your life; but I cannot give you water, there is none here."

"Look for some! look for some!" came from the parched lips. "I shot your father, Langdon, in a fit of passion. I would have killed myself when I heard what I had done; but you know that many praised me for it. I was fully acquitted at my mock trial, and I even induced myself to think that I had performed a meritorious act. Then, too, I loved Alice Brant, your father's ward. I love her now. I knew that you were engaged to her, but, burdened by passion and crime, I believed that I was justified in removing you from her sight—from the very earth—if I could afterward win her affection. My plans were made in vain. I could never gain her love. Now you know why I hated you so. You were ever before me to taunt me with my crime and to separate me from the only being I ever loved. For God's sake, give me water!"

Langdon for a moment looked upon him, then cast his eyes over the field. He saw at some distance a dead man with a canteen at his side. With his broken shoulder bleeding slowly at every movement, he at last with much pain and difficulty reached the spot, and to his delight discovered that the vessel contained a little water. He returned as speedily as possible to the dying man and placed it to his lips; but the succor came too late, and with a bitter, moaning cry he fell back upon the bloody ground, dead.

And Langdon remained beside him till the sun climbed the zenith and poured its hot rays upon his unsheltered wounds. Their pain was intolerable; his brain seemed afire and his tongue was parched with thirst. Reason was deserting him, and he thought he was dying, when he heard a woman shriek, and, looking, he saw his mother kneeling beside him.

It was indeed his mother. For sometime after the fall of Newbern she remained quietly at home, hoping to hear some news of her son. At last it came in a letter from Price, informing her, in well-simulated sorrow, that in spite of all his efforts, "poor Langdon had been shot as a traitor!"

This was a dreadful blow to a loving mother and the gentle Alice Brant. They never thought of doubting the tale, but wept and bemoaned their Edward as one lost forever. At length the attentions of Captain Price, who sometimes visited his old home in disguise, became so odious to Alice, and the sight of the homestead with its many sad associations was so painful to Mrs. Langdon, that they left it in the charge of a friend, and, anxious to do still more for the cause in which they had sacrificed so much, they sought and obtained employment as hospital nurses. They had visited many battle fields, and it was in a mission to the dreadful one of Gettysburg that Mrs. Langdon recognized her son, whom for months she had believed to be dead. He was quickly cared for, and when he returned to consciousness found himself upon a bed in the hospital, with his mother and Alice Brant bending over him. His flag hung above his cot—still wet with blood—a thrilling memorial of the heroism of its preserver.

The wounds were pronounced curable, and ere long he became convalescent, and heard from his mother and Alice the story of their own anxiety and sorrow.

"And can you still love me?" he said to the latter. "You who are still young and beautiful, while I am prematurely old and probably maimed for life?"

"Far better than ever do I love you, dear Edward!" she replied sincerely, "for you have proved yourself worthy of my deepest devotion."

A memorial was sent to Washington, and when the loyalty of Edward Langdon was proved, his name was stricken from the list of prisoners, and he was a free man.

His first act was to enlist for the war; his second to marry Alice Brant. The ceremony was performed by the chaplain of his regiment, a large number of officers who had heard his story being present.

It was soon discovered that he was well versed in military tactics, having indeed received a portion of his education at West Point, and he was offered a commission, which he declined, preferring to enter the service as a private and gain promotion by deeds of valor.

And promotion thus sought was quickly gained: at the head of a gallant band, over which waved his gory battle-flag, Edward Langdon was among the first to enter Richmond—once the stronghold of treason—but now the rallying point of Freedom and the Union.

Too MUCH OF A GOOD THING.—There are draughts everywhere in those houses fitted with the latest ventilating improvements; currents of air such as you meet at the corners of the streets, and which tempt you to protect yourself with an umbrella. In the drawing-room of one of my ventilating friends in particular there is a draught which would blow an umbrella inside out. In the window there is a melancholy machine that moans like an Æolian harp swept by the icy fingers of the east wind. In the centre of the apartment are two curious pillars, gorgeously decorated without, but within full of nothing but the bitterest winds; these, I understand, are modelled after those ventilators which, on board convict-ships and over-crowded emigrant vessels give air to the hold; but—gracious goodness—my blood is not bilge-water, that it should require purification of this sort. To the uninitiated guest, these shifting columns, now shrunk and now distended, are objects of exceeding wonder; a too curious little boy—stranger once pricked one of them with a pin; and that drawing-room was transformed upon the instant into a cavern of Æolus. The poor child was taken up in a whirlwind, and carried about the room like Mr. Home, to the total destruction of the chandler—at least, that is what I heard. But the worst part of that windy drawing-room still remains to be spoken of: this is the fire-place itself. Yes; the one oasis where it might reasonably be imagined that warmth and shelter were to be found, is a noiseless winnowing-machine. Immediately beneath the mantel-piece, just where the small of our back comes, when you would warm yourself with your coat-tails under your arms, there rushes in a torrent of what my friend mendaciously asserts to be warm air. It is as cold as any air I know; I am afflicted with chronic lumbago from having incautiously exposed myself to it; for who would guess that at the very hearthstone of one's friend such an enemy was at work. "O' a' the airs the wind can blow," surely from under the mantel-piece is the most detestable. Chambers' Journal.

A LETTER OF ADVICE.

YOU tell me you're promised a lover,
My own Araminta, next week;
Why cannot my fancy discover
The hue of his coat and his cheek?
Alas! if he look like another,
A vicar, a banker, a beau,
Be deaf to your father and mother,
My own Araminta, say "No!"

Miss Lane, at her Temple of Fashion,
Taught us both how to sing and to speak,
And we loved one another with passion
Before we had been there a week:
You gave me a ring for a token;
I wear it wherever I go;
I gave you a chain—is it broken?
My own Araminta, say "No!"

O think of our favorite cottage,
And think of our dear Lalla Rookh!
How we shared with the milkmaids their pottage,
And drank of the stream from the brook;
How fondly our loving lips faltered
"What further can grandeur bestow?"
My heart is the same; is yours altered?
My own Araminta, say "No!"

Remember the thrilling romances
We read on the bank in the glen;
Remember the suitors our fancies
Would picture for both of us then.
They wore the red cross on their shoulder,
They had vanquished and pardoned their foe—
Sweet friend, are you wiser or colder?
My own Araminta, say "No!"

You know, when Lord Rigmarole's carriage
Drove off with your cousin Justine,
You wept, dearest girl, at the marriage,
And whispered "How hase she has been!"
You said you were sure it would kill you
If ever your husband looked so;
And you will not apostatize—will you?
My own Araminta, say "No!"

When I heard I was going abroad, love,
I thought I was going to die;
We walked arm in arm to the road, love,
We looked arm in arm to the sky;
And I said, "When a foreign postillion
Has hurried me off to the Po,
Forget not Medora Trevillau:
My own Araminta, say "No!"

We parted! but sympathy's fetters
Reach far over valley and hill;
I muse o'er your exquisite letters,
And feel that your heart is mine still;
And he who would share it with me, love—
The richest of treasures below—
If he's not what Orlando should be, love,
My own Araminta, say "No!"

If he wears a top-boot in his wooing,
If he comes to you riding a cob,
If he talks of his baking or brewing,
If he puts up his feet on the hob,
If he ever drinks port after dinner,
If his brow or his breeding is low,
If he calls himself "Thompson" or "Skinner,"
My own Araminta, say "No!"

If he studies the news in the papers
While you are preparing the tea,
If he talks of the damps or the vapors
While moonlight lies soft on the sea,
If he's sleepy while you are capricious,
If he has not a musical "Oh!"
If he does not call Werther delicious—
My own Araminta, say "No!"

If he ever sets foot in the City
Among the stockbrokers and Jews,
If he has not a heart full of pity,
If he don't stand six feet in his shoes,
If his lips are not redder than roses,
If his hands are not whiter than snow,
If he has not the model of noses—
My own Araminta, say "No!"

If he speaks of a tax or a duty,
If he does not look grand on his knees,
If he's blind to a landscape of beauty,
Hills, valleys, rocks, waters and trees,
If he dotes not on desolate towers,
If he likes not to hear the blast blow,
If he knows not the language of flowers—
My own Araminta, say "No!"

He must walk—like a god of old story
Come down from the home of his rest;
He must smile—like the sun in his glory
On the buds he loves ever the best;
And, oh! from its ivory portal
Like music his soft speech must flow!
If he speak, smile or walk like a mortal,
My own Araminta, say "No!"

Don't listen to tales of his bounty,
Don't hear what they say of his birth,
Don't look at his seat in the county,
Don't calculate what he is worth;
But give him a theme to write verse on,
And see if he turns out his toe;
If he's only an excellent person—
My own Araminta, say "No!"

COURTESIES OF THE PRESS.

NOTHING is more readable than a spirited newspaper now, if conducted with eminent vituperative genius on both sides. Country editors, in particular, ought to cultivate the crushing, slang-whanging style, as the sure path to wealth and fame. In large cities it is not so sure a card, and becomes less and less so with the march of intelligence, refinement and good taste. We furnish the following as models for the study of those who aspire to eminence in this department of literature:

A LOW-FLUNG BLACKGUARD.—The literary scullion who does the dirty work on the Clarion of Freedom intimates, in his yesterday's issue, that we are addicted to whisky. In making this statement, the slangwhanging slumgullion lies in his teeth—or rather in his gums, most of his teeth having been knocked down his throat some months since by a gentleman whom he accused of horse-stealing. One thing is certain—we never got drunk at the expense of the scavenger of the Clarion, nor do we owe a whisky bill at every rum-mill in town. Can the Clarion say as much?—Muddleton Independent.

A MEFHITIC PACHYDERM.—Yesterday afternoon, accompanied by a friend, and provided with a serviceable cowhide and a powerful disinfectant, we entered the odorous and dingy hole where the leprous scrivener of the Independent manufactures "literature" by clothing the ideas of a demi rep in the language of a rag-picker. The contemptible ruffian, with the physiognomy of a hangman, and the manners of a hog-driver, who calls himself "editor" of the sheet, was not in. We have since learned that, having got wind of our intended visit, he was at the time concealed in the dust-bin. Owing to our thoughtful precaution in taking with us a bottle of hartshorn and chloride of lime, we escaped from the editorial sty without taking any infectious disease.—Clarion of Freedom.

AN EDITORIAL (NOT CHINESE) STINKPOT.—The tissue of lies in yesterday's Clarion will deceive no one who knows anything of their author. We do not propose to put ourselves upon a level with the slimy exuder of such filth, by entering into a duel of blackguardism with him. We should be beaten at such an encounter, even had we studied scurrility as a science, and practiced it as an art half a lifetime. Our opponent enjoys the advantage of natural qualifications, and, being born a blackguard, excels, without effort, in his vocation. The obscure creature never had the audacity to enter the editorial rooms of the Independent; and the only occasion upon which we ever set our foot in the hole which he calls his "sanctum," was when we accompanied a police officer with a search-warrant to recover a watch which the editor was suspected of having stolen. Our stay on that occasion was of the briefest, we being so overcome by the stench of the place that we were obliged to beat a retreat.—Independent.

The newest system of robbery, announced in London, consists in watching the butcher's man to your house, and then going immediately after with a tray containing meat, and telling the servant that "master has sent the wrong joint," and begging that it may be instantly returned, to be exchanged for the right one. The right one never comes.

A darkey who was drafted in Salem county, New Jersey, attempted, it is said, to commit suicide a few days since. He went in the evening to the railroad track, upon which he laid his head and awaited the coming of the train. The locomotive struck him, but his head proved harder than iron, and resisted the shock, which merely broke his jaw and arm and flung him off the track.

A few months ago, an old gentleman fell dead in the highway of a town in Massachusetts, on whose person was found from twenty to thirty thousand dollars, in bills, on one bank—many of them much worn and mutilated. They were offered at the bank, and the officers were obliged to call a meeting of the directors, in order to ascertain (so old were some of them) if the bank had ever made any such issues.

Artemus Ward, Jr., travelling showman, is about investing his "surplus filthy lucre" in the "Mud Hen Lake Company," which he thus describes: "Those company, accordin' to their prospectuss, is the Knee Plus Utry. It has 1000000000 akers au' a half perch of land with all the modern improvements onto it; a well of never failin' cod liver ile at the frunt dore, and another at the barn; an' a fine stream of double refined Petroleum parses throo the premises; also sevrl men, hosses, ingines, an' other animals erected on the property, for diggin' and pumpin' the same. I make bold to say that Mud Hen Lake air is unsurpassable. Its stoix should be in every well regulated family. They go right to the spot, an' contane noMercury, an' the ladies air delited with 'em—etsettery."

NEW BOOKS.

A. ROMAN & Co., No. 417 and 419 Montgomery street have sent us the following new books, received per steamer:

The Hand-Book of Dining, or Corpulency and Leanness Scientifically Considered, etc. By Brillat-Savarin, author of the Physiologie du Gout. Translated by L. F. Simpson. pp. 200, 16mo. New York: Appleton & Co., 443 and 445 Broadway. San Francisco: A. Roman & Co.

M. Savarin's book is by no means to be compared with Banting, or indeed any other book on the subject of Dietetics. The translator, who seems to have become thoroughly imbued with the quiet audacity of the author, tells us in his preface that "the so-called Banting system, that is to say, the reduction of corpulency, is treated by Savarin in a scientific manner, which will at once cast all other systems in the shade, except those which agree with him." The merest glance at the book is sufficient to assure us of this fact. Beginning with a chapter of aphorisms and concluding with "How to make an Omelette au Thon," we have, comprised within these limits, Sentiment, Friendship, Love, Social and Political Philosophy, Moral Ethics, Poetry, Romance, Psychology and Religion. All this, which might seem to be cheap for the money, after all is perhaps only the natural expression of a Frenchman on the subject of his meals. Banting, whose sensuality was unrelieved by sentiment, and only partially mitigated by an Englishman's natural respect for convenience and personal comfort, confined himself entirely to facts. Some contrasts of the national characteristics may be seen in the different styles of these two famous men. Banting appeals to the English sense of ridicule and the consideration of personal convenience as an argument against the indiscriminate indulgences of the table. Savarin addresses the sentimental philosophy of his countrymen and the inflexible conditions of all glory, heroism and romantic effect. "You can't be a hero and stuff yourself," says Savarin. "You can't be both comfortable and fat," says Banting. "Your friends will poke fun at you," remonstrates the sage of London. "Your mistress will despise you," expostulates the elegant Philosopher of the Court of Cassation. And what more could a Frenchman say? Selfishness is perhaps equally balanced between these champions, but the Englishman deserves the palm of sincerity. To French philosophy, perhaps, belongs the credit of creating animal aesthetics.

In this connection Savarin has drawn us a thrilling picture of the scientific gourmet, of which we can give but a partial glimpse:

"He has eaten well, but not too much; he has drunk the best wines, abstemiously even of the very best. At dessert he has talked of gallantry more than of politics; he has taken a cup of coffee and perhaps a glass of liquor after it. He has been an amiable companion, and has afterwards spent a pleasant evening where music has prevailed. He retires to rest, satisfied with himself and others, his eyes close, and he falls into a calm sleep. Nature is soon relieved. Pleasant dreams hover round him and impart a mysterious existence; he sees the person he loves, finds his favorite occupations and rambles amongst his favorite haunts."

The imagination shrinks from adding anything to this perfect picture of a virtuous Frenchman who has drawn the drapery of his couch around him, and lies down to unimpeded digestion and calm repose. Who can doubt that angels in correct attitudes, bearing perhaps a faint resemblance to the objects of his "gallant" reminiscences do not flutter around his couch? or, that if he should chauce mysteriously to awaken on the other side of the gulf which separates his dining table from the "celestial banquet spread," a proper consideration would not be given to the man who fulfilled so scientifically and elegantly the social requirements of this world?

M. Savarin is much more vivacious and entertaining than Banting, who gives us only a diagnosis of his own case, and whose eminently English mind runs to analytical and synoptical dietary lists. The Hand-Book of Dining is enlivened by anecdote generally apropos, although one incident, related ostensibly to show how the wings of partridges may be served up en papillote, gives a pretty pastoral picture of three young American ladies at whose house the author stopped, and who sang Yankee Doodle for his benefit. The following is more to the point. Speaking of trout, he says:

"A Neapolitan, dining with me one day when I had this dish, exclaimed, 'Questo è un vero boccone ai Cardinali.' 'Why,' I retorted, 'don't you say a dish for a King?' 'My dear sir,' he replied, 'we Italians do not believe that kings are gourmets; their repasts are too short and too solemn; but cardinals! eh!!' and he chuckled with delight, 'Hou hou, hou hou, hou hou!'"

This has the true Savarin ring. The story of "Louise," a personal reminiscence, is, however, peculiarly touching. Louise, for whom the author had a "platonic friendship," it appears drank vinegar to reduce her somewhat redundant embonpoint. She lost, alas! not only flesh but health. Even the compliments of Savarin, who declared that "she could afford neither to gain or lose," had no effect. But why torture the reader? Louise died:

"She was the first person I ever saw die; she died in my arms, as, at her wish, I was raising her up that she might behold the light. Some days after her death, I accompanied her bereaved mother to take a last glance at her countenance. With surprise we observed that a radiant, almost an ecstatic, expression was on her features, which was not there when she died. I was astonished. The mother drew from it a favorable augury; but this is not a rare occurrence. Lavater mentions it in his 'Treatise on Physiognomy.'"

So much for drinking vinegar.

Ghost Stories. With illustrations by Darley. 16 mo. pp. 192. New York: James Miller, 522 Broadway. San Francisco: A. Roman & Co.

A peculiarly inoffensive collection of ghost stories, with the supernatural appearances carefully explained away. Although this collection is perhaps invaluable for its healthful tendency, the rational ending of each story seems to operate as an anti-climax, and, we can't help thinking, spoils the general effect. To be harrassed in mind by certain incidents which are apparently of a supernatural character, and then to have them ruthlessly explained, is apt to place the reader in a ridiculous position which every genuine lover of the marvellous must unhesitatingly deplore. A vein of quiet satire runs through some of the stories, particularly that of "The Spectre of Cucuza," which has quite a flavor of Washington Irving. The following extract is a fair specimen of the character of this ghost book:

APPARITION OF LORD WILLIAM PETTY.

It is affirmed that Lord William Petty, who was under the care of Dr. Priestley, the librarian, and the Rev. Mr. Jervis, his tutor, was attacked, at the age of seven, with inflammation of the lungs, for which Mr. Alsop was summoned to Bowood. After a few days, the young nobleman seemed to be out of danger; but, on a sudden relapse, the surgeon was again sent for in the evening.

It was night before this gentleman reached Bowood, but an unclouded moon showed every object in unequivocal distinctness. Mr. Alsop had passed through the lodge gate, and was proceeding to the house, when, to his astonishment, he saw Lord William coming towards him, in all the buoyancy of childhood, restored, apparently, to health and vigor. "I am delighted, my dear lord," he exclaimed, "to see you, but, for Heaven's sake, go immediately within doors; it is death to you to be here at this time of night." The child made no reply, but, turning round, was quickly out of sight. Mr. Alsop, unspeakably surprised, hurried to the house. Here all was distress and confusion, for Lord William had expired a few minutes before he reached the portico.

This sad event being with all speed announced to the Marquis of Lansdowne, in London, orders were soon received at Bowood for the interment of the corpse and the arrangement of the funeral procession. The former was directed to take place at High Wickham, in the vault which contained the remains of Lord William's mother; the latter was appointed to halt at two specified places during the two nights on which it would be on the road. Mr. Jervis and Dr. Priestley attended the body. On the first day of the melancholy journey, the latter gentleman, who had hitherto said little on the subject of the appearance to Mr. Alsop, suddenly addressed his companion with considerable emotion in nearly these words: "There are some very singular circumstances connected with this event, Mr. Jervis, and a most remarkable coincidence between a dream of the late Lord William and our present mournful engagement. A few weeks ago, as I was passing by his room door one morning, he called me to his bed-side: 'Doctor,' said he, 'what is your Christian name?' 'Surely,' said I, 'you know it is Joseph.' 'Well, then,' replied he, in a lively manner, 'if you are Joseph, you can interpret a dream for me, which I had last night. I dreamed, doctor, that I set out upon a long journey; that I stopped the first night at Hungerford, whither I went without touching the ground; that I flew from thence to Salt Hill, where I remained the next night, and arrived at High Wickham on the third day, where my dear mamma, beautiful as an angel, stretched out her arms and caught me within them.' 'Now,' continued the doctor, 'these are precisely the places where the dear child's corpse will remain on this and the succeeding night before we reach his mother's vault, which is finally to receive it.'"

Now here is a tissue of events as strange as they are circumstantial; and I might set myself to illustrate the apparition by the agitated state of Mr. Alsop's mind, were it not for the utter fallacy of this mysterious story, on which the late Rev. Mr. Jervis, of Brompton, whom I knew and esteemed deemed it essential to publish "Remarks" in the year 1831. From these you will learn that Mr. Warner is in error regarding the "address, designation, and age of the Hon. William Granville Petty, the nature and duration of his disorder, and the name of the place of interment." And then it comes out that neither Dr. Priestley nor Mr. Jervis attended the funeral, nor conversed at any time on the circumstance; and, regarding Mr. Alsop's death-bed declaration, Mr. Jervis, who was in his intimate confidence, never heard of such a thing until Mr. Warner's volume was pointed out to him.

This strange story, believed by good and wise men, involved a seeming mystery, until we read in Mr. Jervis's "Remarks" one simple sentence in reference to the gentleman by whom it was first told—that "the enthusiasm of his nature predisposed him to entertain some visionary and romantic notions of supernatural appearances."

Life of Felix Mendelssohn Bartholdy. From the German of W. A. Lampadius. Edited and translated by William Leonhard Gage. 12 mo. pp. 271. New York and Philadelphia: Frederick Leypoldt. San Francisco: A. Roman & Co.

A biography of the great German composer, to which is added an appendix of selected tributes to his genius, comprising about one-half the volume. The work is extremely interesting to musicians, as it gives the progressive data of his most famous compositions, the circumstances under which they were written, and their acceptance by the public. Of the first representation of Midsummer Night's Dream, the author says:

"At the close of the year, since we could not have Mendelssohn in person, we were glad to have him represented to our hearing in the music of the 'Midsummer Night's Dream,' brought upon the Leipzig stage for the first time. I cannot praise the decorations, nor the quality of the orchestra; for Leipzig could not furnish the appliances which Berlin could offer; and the music was presented on too massive a scale, and with too little delicacy. Still, the impression which it produced was only a new tribute to its favor. We were compelled to see in it a new proof of the composer's depth of nature, and were led by his magic power to enjoy his creation of a world of pure fancy, inhabited by bright and light-hearted spirits, who confront with their sunny nothingness the yet greater triviality of what is called practical life, and, with the aids of poesy and love, win the day. The music was no new creation: it was merely the unfolding and completing of what had already been given, in more condensed form, in the overture there long a favorite. The charming fairy antics on the leaves, the fascination of moonlight, the awkward merriment of the rustics, the longing and pain of disappointed love, the chivalry of the old heroic days, and the festive pomp of a princely wedding—all this was so skillfully portrayed in the brilliant coloring of the overture, that it only needed further enlargement, and adaptation of the various changes of scene in the play; and this is what the composer had done, with infinite tact and the justest appreciation. The parts entirely new were the charming chorus of the fairies singing 'Titania' to sleep; the beautiful 'Night Song' without words, of true Italian glow, which accompanied Titania's rest in the grotto; and the wonderfully brilliant and stirring 'Wedding March,' with its fascinating trio."

Two Logs, by Jeems Pipes. J. C. Haney, 109 Warren street, New York. San Francisco: A. Roman & Co.

A comic pamphlet by Stephen C. Massett, profusely illustrated, being a burlesque log kept on shipboard to while away the tediousness of passage, and tolerable under no other circumstances.

THE TWO CLEOPATRAS.

NIGHT is the shadow of that Ethiop queen,
With brow as dark as Night, as richly jewelled
In barbarous ravishment of luxury:
The enchantress of the Cydnus in her toils,
Seeking new pleasures, slaying joys with sighs
And drowning mirth with her full tide of tears.

Night is the shadow of that Ethiop queen,
In rapturous witchery of beatitude
Who drank an hundred pearls, immaculate
In their white gloom of glory, and of rare
And fabulous richness. Lo! the baughty queen
Heaped the all-immensurable wealth
Of treasures rare within a vessel, where,
Breathing a mist of filmy radiance—
A scented vapor woven of gemmy rays
That lurked in nebulous folds about the latent,
Limpid and viewless confines of the vessel—
The copious fund, the teeming store of treasure
Was straight dissolved and lost in the crisp bubbling
And all-devouring properties of acids.

Then, after this accomplished, did she mingle
With added juices, spice and redolence
Of various tinctures, a most savory draught.
Her folded fingers held the jewelled verge
Of the clear goblet, from pure ether hewn,
Or some most lincnt crystal, delicate,
And laid the gleaming halo of the goblet
Against the amorous volume of her lips,
Where broke the violent fever of her love
In turgid crimson, deepening the ripe tint
Of the silky curtains hung about the proud
Voluptuous tower of her enticing feature.
So, staying the hot current of her blood
In the drowsy syrup, clotted here and there
And crusted in pearl-ices, glittering pastes,
And frosty miracles of rich congealment
About the invisible limits of the vessel:
Yet drunk she all the incalculable value
Of crystalizing dregs, and hurled the cup
At a dumb serving slave, a fawning eunuch
Black as bell's border, crouching close along,
The swelling curvature of her fair barge
Heading the vast armada as it lay
Beached among the silver of the Cydnus.
The dense aroma of their several freights
Had quite enshrouded the zephyr, and they lay
Beating the silver bosom of the Cydnus,—
Like prisoned birds, with fretful throbs of wings,
Beating the bosom of the silver Cydnus,
Close upon Tarsus, where reveled Antony.

Night is the shadow of that Ethiop queen:
She strews the seas with stars innumerable—
The bubbly sea with stars which are as pearls;
And when the wave is like to stiffen, or burst
Its dusky rind for too great store of rare
And gleaming treasure, Night! lo, baughty Night,
The very shadow of that Ethiop queen
Dips at the borders of the teeming sea
And drinks the richness of the winy flood,
Leaving the world as empty of the dark
And cloudy turbulence of Muscadine
As was the crystal chalice that was drained
By the proud darg of old Egypt's queen.

THE PETROLEUM FIEND.

A STORY OF TO-DAY.

PART TWO.

NEARLY three years of unexampled prosperity had flown over the head of Mr. Sparrowhawk, duly authorized agent of the "Original Petroleum Co." The company was in a flourishing condition. It was true that the Superintendent and agent had not met since the mysterious interview we have recorded; but this circumstance did not seem to interrupt business. There were certain unfailing wells belonging to the company, one or two manufactories in full blast, and a central office over which Mr. Sparrowhawk presided. How he kept his books, or to whom he was responsible, was nobody's business. None of the stock was in market, and the stockholders were unknown. Sharp people whispered, "foreign capital;" Mr. Sparrowhawk smiled significantly but did not deny it.

In fact, he had grown exceedingly opulent and respectable. His name stood foremost on all subscription lists; he was director of half a dozen charitable institutions, and Mrs. S. was the President of a Ladies' Christian Commission for providing wounded soldiers in hospital with Fox's Martyrs and Edwards' Sermons. Mr. S. had a pew in a fashionable church. He rarely wrote poetry now, and only of an inferior quality. But if riches enervated his muse there was compensation in the truth that criticism is always lenient to prosperity. That a man with thirty thousand a year should write any poetry at all was enough for society to be thankful for.

But Mr. Sparrowhawk had of late been subject to fits of gloomy despondency and abstraction, and as the third year drew near its close he grew quite haggard and wan. He would shut himself up for days together studying his agreement, which, like most documents of a similar nature, can be made, by continued perusal, to exhibit any meaning you choose to give it. Often in the midst of gay company he would lapse into a sullen silence, and once, at a dinner-party, given at his palatial residence, the conversation turning upon the late petroleum conflagration in one of the Eastern cities, an unlucky guest, who was giving a graphic account of the burning alive of some unhappy wretches in the streets, was shocked by Mr. Sparrowhawk fainting dead away in his chair. Like Lady Macbeth on a similar occasion, Mrs. Sparrowhawk undertook the disagreeable duty of apologizing to the guests. Unlike that somewhat overrated Scotchwoman, she did it gracefully, and did not commit the egregious blunder of sending the guests away before they had finished their dinner and thus giving them the opportunity of indulging in mischievous remarks. It was observed after this that Mr. Sparrowhawk avoided fires, even on the coldest evenings, and seemed to shun lights and matches as if he had been tinder.

Besides his town residence, he had a magnificent country house, erected on the oil lands of the company, and located over one of the deepest wells in that region. The house was warmed by petroleum fires and lighted by its vapor. Here Mr. Sparrowhawk had invited a number of guests on the occasion of his retiring from the agency—an event which was to be duly celebrated. A select and brilliant circle of admirers and friends of all classes and conditions—clergymen, bankers, brokers, editors and doctors—all of them more or less interested in petroleum—gathered on that day. A remarkable and peculiar gaiety held possession of the host and hostess. Mr. Sparrowhawk had never talked more ably. Mrs. S. had never shone more brilliantly at the head of her festive board. An editor, who was seated on her left, took that occasion to whisper in her ear something about the "Isles of Greece" and "Burning Sappho," but was chagrined that his fair companion did not blush, but only turned pale and shuddered. As these physiological effects were not inconsequent to so atrocious a pun, the other guests took no further notice of them. The seat of honor on the right of Mr. Sparrowhawk was occupied by a nice little bald-headed old gentleman, who, by the power of his conversation, had fascinated the whole assembly, and who, as an apparently old friend of the host and hostess, assisted in dispensing the honors of the house. It was the little old gentleman who proposed a visit to the lower regions, and undertook to conduct a number of selected guests through one of the oil shafts and brought them back afterward, smelling strongly of benzoine. It was the little old gentleman who also proposed charades in the private theatre attached to the country seat, and under whose artistic management a number of surprising and astonishing effects were produced. "Benzoine," "Coal Oil" and "Kerosene" were successively spelled out by the company. But the final charade, as the old gentleman remarked, would require some preparation, and would include some new effects which would astound them. Selecting his actors from the assembled company, he retired behind the curtain. An interval, long enough to enable the audience to indulge in exciting speculation, followed, and then the curtain rose.

As the little old gentleman had truly prophesied, the effect was wonderful and intensely dramatic. The scene before them represented a vast temple brilliantly illuminated. This was singularly effected by a circling row of statues placed on short pedestals at equal distances around the temple—each statue gleaming with incandescent brilliancy. A closer inspection revealed the fact that each figure was represented by some well-known guest, Mr. and Mrs. Sparrowhawk occupying a prominent central position and gleaming with almost insupportable lustre. The bland features of a well-known clergyman beamed gloriously from a conspicuous plinth on the right, while a prosperous banker glittered and scintillated on the left. A tremendous round of applause burst from the audience. Suddenly attention was directed to the little old gentleman, who entered upon the scene carrying several large covers like extinguishers. Striding up to each of these animated burners, he, one by one, gravely covered them with an extinguisher, beginning with the host and hostess, until the stage, lately so brilliant, was left in total darkness. A slight snuffy smell, in spite of this precaution, pervaded the theatre.

The spokesman consulted a moment with the audience, and then announced the word:

"Extinguisher."

No answer came from the stage.

The word was repeated.

Still no answer. A little alarmed he leaped upon the stage and lifted the extinguisher which covered Mr. Sparrowhawk. A heap of discolored ashes with a strong petroleum odor was all that lay underneath. He repeated the experiment with Mrs. Sparrowhawk and the remaining statues, but with the same result. Diligent inquiry was made for the little old gentleman, but he was nowhere to be found.

As may be expected, the guests were somewhat embarrassed. But good breeding prevailed, and they quietly returned to town without confusion. A little justifiable indignation was felt towards the host and hostess, but even that was tempered by philosophy, and the most ill-tempered confessed that but little better could be expected from the parties.

So perished Mr. and Mrs. Sparrowhawk. I am aware that this story has no moral. Whatever interest it may have is based entirely upon its merit as a statement of facts.

MONSIEUR CRAPEAUD.

LENT has passed; our forty days of fasting and abstinence from the frivolities of the world are faithfully performed. Now can we, poor snakes, emerge from the observance of our Faith and expand and burgeon in the full blaze and sunshine of gayeties. Who shall say that a rigid exclusion of forty days does not entitle us to enjoy with renewed gusto the social cakes and ale that are now showered upon us? Fortunate mortals! whose faith is so regulated that an apparent deprivation really becomes but repose from past and a stimulant for future enjoyments. We rush with more than usual eagerness to hear the Brambilla, we count the cost of white kids as nought, and we cut a figure, in a modest way, with the fresh enthusiasm of a debutant. Oh, those convenient forty days! during which we have faithfully, every Sunday, listened to the somewhat nasal psalm of "Praise ye the Lord!" Now will we hear, with a sense of relief, the gushings of the prima donna, the rich voice of the baritone, and even the ineffectual and feeble false notes of the tenor. Hardly had the Semana Santa passed away, our faces had hardly assumed the "quips and cranks and wreathed smiles," so unpardonable in Lent, when our anticipations of enjoyment are doubled by the arrival of the sons of la belle nation! Reared in the lap of Terpsichore, the pets of the Graces, our ideals and models of elegance, the Frenchmen are among us to flourish in the flowery paths of the beau monde, to daze a fortunate few in the giddy mazes of the dance, to give an impetus to the careful study of a bow, or to benefit us with some private lessons in the graces.

Let us, then, improve the passing hour, for we have Paris in our midst, and we can learn from it the urbanity that, united to our own frankness, would make American manners irresistible. Think of it! The charming openness and frankness of our society has an opportunity now to acquire to itself the polished courtesy of the Parisien. Should we neglect so glorious an opportunity? They are in our very midst; we see them every day. Even in our thoroughfares are they, the very tall linked with the very short. Indeed, we have begun to doubt whether there were any medium height among them. Very tall men, however, condescend to the very small courtesies of life, and very short men aspire to the loftiest politeness. We see it at a glance. It is as it should be; there are no medium men, who neither aspire to elevated courtesy nor stoop to the small amenities. Let us ponder, therefore, and well and truly try to profit by the lesson set before us.

On the morning of April 16th, H. I. M. La Victoire arrived in San Francisco. She is a frigate of thirty-four guns, a crew of between five and six hundred men, bears the Admiral's flag and is one of the finest French men-of-war on this coast. We may therefore consider her a most favorable specimen of the wooden Navy of France. Shall we go on board in one of their enormous twelve or fourteen-oared boats, and examine with a curiosity pardonable in an American? And this curiosity is of a searching character that begins at the beginning and prys its way into all objects, great and small. It is, also, of a comparative turn of mind, and materially enough adopts for its standard our own American institutions. Notice these sailors that are pulling us off: thorough Frenchmen are they all, from the dark-haired, olive-skinned native of the South of France, with his Gascon accent, to the fair but hardy Norman. They are good, sturdy, strong men, fine materiel. They should be good seamen, too. Billeted into the navy, they are sent to the naval rendezvous at Cherbourg or Brest, drilled and exercised, not only in the duties of the sailor but those of a soldier. They are not then sent to sea, raw recruits, but only after a year or more of practice in their duties. Their transition to sea-life and a sailor's labor is gradual, and unlike that of the American seamen, who leave a plow or a shovel, to handle at once the slush-bucket and the tarred rigging. But the maritime history of the world proves the American seaman the best. The fight of the Kearsarge and the Alabama tells its story. Who composed the crew of the Alabama but English seamen. English gunners and English engineers? And in a fair, cool trial of prowess, the American seamen, American gunners and American engineers gloriously proved their superiority. But, revenons à nos moutons—we will return to the subject, if you please. We were looking at French sailors, and we shall find plenty of them on board. They are indeed fine materiel, a little below the average height, perhaps, but well-built, sturdy men, ready and willing for their work. Going over the gangway we come to a fine broad deck, not so white, however, nor so commodious as that of the Lancaster. (Please allow our investigations to indulge the comparative tendency.) As we walk forward, passing the two immense launches that saved the storeship Rhin, from total destruction, we come among the live stock. The patient cattle stand awaiting the butcher's orders, contemplating the mournful spectacle of the suspended quarters of some former companion. We can hardly examine the forward rifles on account of the cattle, which also, alas! spoil the appearance of the deck. To run the eye along a frigate's deck and have the view terminate in a cow-yard is to destroy the illusion partially. But as a sanitary regulation the carrying of live stock is doubtless correct. Two other rifled guns are on this deck, run back out of the way as much as possible, but ready at any time to be run out at any of the ports. The poop-deck is a fine place to promenade. We are above the guns the boats and the cutter, and there is a sensation there of superiority and relief. Viewed from on board, this upper deck will always disappoint a visitor. From the water, La Victoire appears well; her lines are graceful and her build substantial and well modelled, though, to our thinking, and to indulge again in comparison, she is not so pleasing to the eye as the Lancaster, though apparently a little longer. Neither are her spars so graceful as those of the Lancaster. Aloft, La Victoire is more English than American.

From the upper deck to the gun deck! Ah, where are the snow white ladders of the American man-of-war? We must pass unnoticed a trifling lack of soap and water. The battery consists of thirty-four guns, all rifled, except four old-fashioned smooth-bores of the date of 1829. An entire battery of rifled pieces is considered, we believe, in our own navy, to be a mistake. The heavy 9 or 10-inch guns are more effective, while the rifles are reserved for long distances. Happening on one occasion to be in Acapulco, while La Victoire was lying at anchor, we had an opportunity of witnessing the practice of her long-range rifles. A party of Mexicans had been discerned on the hillsides, and they were disturbed by visits from these long-range pieces, which sent messages to them from time to time in the shape of a long, comical, steel-pointed percussion shell. We could distinguish the place in which they struck, a distance of over three miles. The poor, ignorant Mexicans must have thought that their French invaders had terribly long guns!

A flying visit must be paid to the engine-room—and in machinery certainly the French frigate is superior to our own. Her engines are powerful and well built, and the boiler-room very large, there being six boilers, with thirty-six furnaces. Everything is bright and clean here, at least. Mounting again to the deck, we find a stream of curieux coming on board, to gaze and pry, as we have been doing. Let us practise a bow—a bow, did I say—we will have a good lesson while we are about it, and between the port side of the deck and the gangway we shall have occasion to make many of them. We shall do our best, as our friend, with gold cords profusely slung over his shoulder, is showing us how, and, as gracefully as we can, bow ourselves over the gangway and into the boat. Is it simply a hearty national pride, or a real, honest conviction that draws from us, as we shove off from the side, the remark "She cannot compare with the Lancaster"? I believe, Monsieur Crapeaud, it is a compound of both, and we are in the majority now; so you must submit, with as graceful a shrug of the shoulders as you can execute, to the opinion. Au revoir, M. Crapeaud. M. N. S.

THE SUMMONS.

MY ear is full of summer sounds,
Of summer sights my languid eye;
Beyond the dusty village bounds
I loiter in my daily rounds,
And in the noon-time shadows lie.

I hear the wild bee wind his horn,
The bird swings on the ripened wheat,
The long green lanes of the corn
Are tilting in the winds of morn,
The locust shrills his song of heat.

Another sound my spirit hears,
A deeper sound that drowns them all—
A voice of pleading choked with tears,
The call of human hopes and fears,
The Macedonian cry to Paul!

The storm-bell rings, the trumpet blows;
I know the word and countersign;
Wherever Freedom's vanguard goes,
Where stand or fall her friends or foes,
I know the place that should be mine.

Shamed be the hoo that idly fold,
And lips that woo the reed's accord,
When laggard Time the hour has tolled
For true with false and new with old
To fight the battles of the Lord!

O brothers! blest by partial Fate
With power to match the will and deed,
To him your summons comes too late
Who sinks beneath his armor's weight,
And has no answer but God-speed!

MISS M. E. BRADDON'S NEW NOVEL.

ONLY A CLOD.

By the author of "Aurora Floyd," "Three Times Dead," "Lady Audley's Secret," "The Doctor's Wife," "The Outcasts," etc.

CHAPTER XXVII.

SEEING A GHOST.

UNDER the perpetual influence of his friend and master Harcourt Lowther, Mr. Tredethlyn's days and nights were so fully occupied that he had very little leisure for serious thought. Day by day the patient master taught his deadly lesson; day by day the luckless pupil took his teacher's precepts more deeply to heart. The simple, credulous nature was as malleable as clay under the practised hand of the modeller, and took any shape Mr. Lowther chose to give it.

Francis was fully impressed with the idea that his money had purchased a lovely wife whose heart could never be given to him. All that fair fabric of hopes and dreams which had been his when he married Maude Hillary had been slowly, but surely undermined, and there was nothing left of its brightness but the memory that it once had been. He thought of those foolish hopes now with anger and bitterness. Could he have ever been so mad, so blind, so besotted, as to believe that this beautiful creature, perpetually floating in an atmosphere of frivolity and adulation, would ever fold her wings to nestle tenderly in his rude breast? Othello, recalled to the sense of his declining years and grimy visage by the friendly bluntness of Iago, could scarcely have thought more bitterly of his lovely Venetian bride than Francis thought of Maude after six months' daily association with his old master. But if the poison was swift to do its deadly work, the antidote was always at hand. With thirty thousand a year, and a fine constitution, what need has a young man for reflection? It is all very well for Mr. Young, the poet, having failed to obtain wealth or preferment, to retire from a world which has treated him ill, and meditate upon the transitory nature of earthly blessings that he has been unable to obtain: but with youth and thirty thousand per annum, surely no man need be bothered by such a darkness as guest care. Harcourt Lowther did his best to shield his friend from the gloomy intruder by contriving that Francis Tredethlyn's existence should be one perpetual fever of hurry and excitement. But though you may carry a man from race-course to race-course, by shrieking expresses tearing through the darkness of the night; though you may steep him to the lips in theatres and dancing halls; though you may drag him from one scene of mad unrest to another, till his tired eyeballs have lost their power to see anything but one wearisome confusion of gaslight and color, you cannot prevent him thinking. The involuntary process goes on in spite of him. He will think in a hansom cab tearing over the stones of the Haymarket, in an express train rushing towards Newmarket at sixty miles an hour, on the box seat of a guardsman's drag, on the rattling fire-engine of an aristocratic amateur Braidwood, on the downs at Epsom; yes, even at the final rush when every eye is strained to concentrate its power of sight upon one speck of color, the man's mind, forever the veriest slave to follow that will-o'-the-wisp called association, will wander away in spite of him—to mourn above a baby's grave, to sit amidst the perfume of honey-suckle and roses in a still summer twilight, trifling with the rings on a woman's hand.

There were times when thought would come to Francis Tredethlyn, in spite of all his friend's watchful care. He would sit at the head of a dinner-table at the "Crown and Sceptre," staring vacantly at the frisky wine-bubbles in his shallow glass, and thinking how happy he might have been if Maude had only loved him. Ah, this poor substitute of noise instead of mirth—this pitiful tinsel of dissipation in place of the pure gold of happiness—how miserable a mockery it was even at the best!

Mr. Lowther generally broke in upon such gloomy reveries as these by calling to the waiter to exchange his friend's shallow glass for a tumbler. But there are pangs of regret not to be lulled to slumber by all the sparkling wines that were ever grown in the fair champagne country, and Harcourt Lowther sometimes found his work very difficult.

But amidst such perpetual hurry and excitement it was only natural that some things should be almost entirely forgotten by Francis Tredethlyn, and amongst these forgotten things were the sorrows of his missing cousin. The Gray's Inn lawyers had carte blanche, and could have employed all the detective machinery in London in a search for Susan Tredethlyn, alias Susan Lesley, had they so chosen; but your intensely respectable family solicitor is the slowest of slow coaches, and Messrs. Kursdale and Scardon contented themselves with the insertion of an occasional advertisement in the second column of the Times supplement, informing Susan Lesley that she might hear of something to her advantage on applying at their office; and further offering a liberal reward for any information respecting the above-mentioned lady.

The advertisement did not entirely escape notice. A good many Susan Lesleys presented themselves: one a fat old woman of seventy, who kept a tobacconist's shop in the neighborhood of Seven Dials; another a bony and pugnacious-looking person, with fiery red hair and a fine South of Ireland brogue, who threatened dire vengeance on the quiet lawyer when he refused to recognize her pretensions to hear of something to her advantage. All the Susan Lesleys were ready to swear anything in order to establish their claims to that unknown advantage—which might be anything from a five-pound note to a million of money, or a dormant peerage—but they all broke down lamentably under Mr. Kursdale's cross-questioning, and he did not even trouble Francis to confront the false syrens.

So amid Newmarket meetings and Greenwich dinners, chicken-hazard, billiards, and unlimited loo, poor Susan's rustic image melted quite away; and Francis forgot the solemn promise he had made, and the sacred duty he had set himself to do when his uncle Oliver's heritage first fell into his hands. And Francis Tredethlyn's forgetfulness might have lasted very long if an accident had not awakened him to a most vivid recollection of the past.

It was the Maytime saturnalia of the turf, the Epsom week, and Mr. Tredethlyn's drag had been to and fro upon the dusty roads carrying a heavy load of Bohemianism under convoy of the indefatigable Harcourt Lowther. Francis had been rather unlucky, and a good deal of money had changed hands after the Derby, the larger part of it finding its way into the pockets of Mr. Tredethlyn's obliging friend. The Oaks day was to have redeemed his fortunes, but the day was over, and Francis drove home amongst the noisy ruck of landaus and wagonettes, ponderous double dog-carts, and heavily laden sociables, tax-cabs and costermongers' barrows, with the outer leaves of an attenuated cheque-book peeping from his breast pocket, and the dim consciousness that he had distributed hastily scribbled cheques to the amount of some thousands, floating confusedly in his brain. He drove to town through the spring twilight, with Dutch dolls in his hat, and a heavy pain in his heart. The papier maché noses of his companions were scarcely more false and hollow than their gaiety.

Of course it would be impossible to conclude such a day without a dinner. The sort of people amongst whom Francis Tredethlyn was perpetually dining and giving dinners only the dinner-givers are as one to twenty of the dinners; so at some time between nine and ten o'clock Maude's husband found himself in his usual place at the head of a glittering table in an odoriferous atmosphere of asparagus soup and fried mullet, and with a racking headache that was intensified by every jingle of glasses and rattle of knives and forks.

He had lost heavily, and had drunk deeply under the warm May sunshine on the Downs. To lose cheerfully is given to many men, but how very few have the power to lose quietly! Francis had taken his disappointments in a rather uproarious spirit; slapping his companions on the shoulder, and making new engagements right and left; losing the same horses by whose shortcomings he had just lost his money; and huskily protesting the soundness of his own judgment in despite of the misfortunes of to-day.

He went on talking now at the head of the dinner-table, though the sound of his own voice by no means improved the splitting pain in his head. He went on talking amidst a clamor of many voices, through which one sober and silent toady, sitting next Mr. Tredethlyn, made a vain effort to understand his discourse. He poured forth misty vaticinations on coming events, gave general invitations for a great dinner at Virginia Water on the Ascot cup day, and galloped noisily along the road to ruin in which Harcourt Lowther had set him going. That splitting headache of his was getting worse every minute, when some one proposed an adjournment to an adjacent theatre.

There had been counsel taken with a waiter. A West End waiter is no mean dramatic critic, though he never sees a play; the opinions of playgoers percolating perpetually through his ears must leave some residuum in the shape of knowledge. The waiter opined that the best entertainment in London was to be had at Drury Lane, where a melodramatic spectacle of some celebrity was being played that evening for the last time but one.

Inspired by the waiter, Mr. Tredethlyn's party made their way to the theatre, bearing Mr. Tredethlyn along with them, indifferent where he went, and carrying his headache with him everywhere. It was ten o'clock, and the last scene of the great spectacle was on. The house was full, and the audience were chiefly of that restless and vociferous order who drop into a theatre at half-price on great race nights. Mr. Tredethlyn and his party could only find standing-room at the back of the dress circle, and from this position Francis beheld the grand final tableau.

The piece was an adaptation of some great Parisian success—some story of the Reign of Terror—and in this last scene the stage was crowded by a clamorous populace. Upwards of three hundred men, women and children were engaged in the scene. Blouses and uniforms, the picturesque head-dresses of the provincial peasantry, the scarlet cap of liberty, the cocked hats of the gendarmerie—all blended in one grand mass of movement and color, while the rapid action of the piece drew to its triumphant close.

Mr. Tredethlyn did not trouble himself to wonder what the piece had been about. He saw somebody killed—a villain it was to be supposed, since the crowd set up a well-organized yell of rejoicing; then there was a reconciliation, an embrace, a young lady in white muslin clasped to the breast of a young man in a long-tailed blue-coat and low top-boots, adorned with many-colored bunches of ribbon. Then the band broke into the stately measure of the "Marschallaise Hymn," the crowd clamored a shrill chorus, and the curtain fell.

It was while the curtain was descending very slowly to that triumphant music that Francis Tredethlyn saw something which startled him like the sight of a ghost.

It was a face—a woman's face in high Normandy cap, looking out of the many faces in the crowd—a thin, worn, melancholy countenance, very sad to look upon, among all those other faces fronting the audience with a stereotyped smile.

"My God!" cried Mr. Tredethlyn, clasping his two hands upon his hot forehead, and pushing back the rumpled hair, "who is it? What's the matter with me? I feel as if I'd seen a ghost!"

There was a little piece after the melodrama, a slender little production popularly known as a "screaming" farce. It was not the most strikingly original dramatic invention, and its chief point consisted in one gentleman in tartan trousers being perpetually mistaken for another gentleman in tartan trousers, while both gentlemen were alternately sitting upon bonnet-boxes and dropping trays of crockery.

There was certainly not very much in the farce, but the audience laughed uproariously, and Francis Tredethlyn's party joined in the laughter. He found himself laughing, too, as loudly as the rest of them; but amidst all that confusion and clamor the wan, sad face with two inartistic patches of rouge upon its hollow cheeks kept haunting up ever and anon out of the chaos of his brain, and hurting him like the lace of a ghost.

Who was it? What was it? Was it some accidental likeness? Was it a face that he had seen and known in the past? Alas for the steady, clear-headed soldier, who had been so prompt to obey military orders, so strict in the performance of duty! Francis Tredethlyn's muddled senses refused to help him to-night. The author of What will he do with it? tells us that light wines are the most treacherous of liquors; "they inflame the brain like fire, while melting on the palate like ice." Mr. Tredethlyn had been drinking a mixture of divers champagnes and Moselles all day long, and he tried in vain to fix the vague image which floated amidst the confusion of his brain.

He went home in the early grey of the May morning, but not to sleep. He lay tossing from side to side, tormented by that preternatural wakefulness which is apt to succeed a long period of riot and excitement. The course at Epsom, the gipsy fortune-tellers, the betting men in white hats and green veils, the Dutch dolls and pink calico piousshions, the dust and clamor of the homeward drive, the jingling of broken glass, the popping of corks, the revolutionary crowd in the drama, the tartan trousers and broken bandboxes in the farce—all mixed themselves in his brain, falling to pieces and putting themselves together again like the images in a kaleidoscope.

Mr. Lowther, coming to see his friend at the correct visiting hour, found Francis still in bed, in a little room behind the library, which he had fitted up for himself at Harcourt's instigation, as a bed-room and dressing-room, a kind of refuge to which he might betake himself when he was unfit to encounter the calm gaze of Maude's clear blue eyes fixed upon him in sorrowful wonder. Her manner to him had never quite recovered its old kindness since that unlucky encounter on the stairs; she was still kind to him, but he could see that it was by an effort only that she retained anything of her old friendliness. He could see this, and the knowledge of it galled him to the quick. Harcourt Lowther's work was more than half done by this time. He had no longer any difficulty in beguiling Francis abroad, for the Cornishman no longer cared to remain at home.

Mr. Tredethlyn had not very long fallen into a feverish slumber after long hours of wakeful weariness, when his friend called upon him. Harcourt seated himself by the side of the narrow brass bedstead, and stared contemplatively at the sleeper, while he spoke to the valet who had admitted him to the darkened chamber.

"You can let your master sleep till four o'clock, Jervois," he said. "At four give him some soda brandy. He has an appointment with me at half-past five. Take care that he doesn't oversleep himself. I'll write him a line by way of reminder."

He drew a little writing-table towards him, and wrote a few lines on a sheet of note-paper:

"DEAR TREDETHLYN: Remember your engagement at my quarters: 5:30 sharp. You had better bring the mail phaeton, and can give me a lift to the 'S. and G.' Yours faithfully, H. L."

He slipped his note into an envelope, and dipped his pen into the ink, but before writing the address he stopped suddenly, and tore the note into fragments.

"She might see it!" he muttered, thoughtfully, "and that might show her the nature of my cards. The only wise man is the one who can do his work without that most dangerous of all machinery—pen and paper. Poor Francis! he looks a little worn."

Mr. Lowther looked down upon the sleeper with the most benign expression. He had no dislike whatever to the simple Cornishman; he had only—his own plans.

"These fellows who suddenly come into a large fortune are sure to kill themselves before they have done spending it," he murmured, complacently. "Jervois," he said, as he went out, "you won't forget your master's engagement. He'd better drive up to my place in the mail phaeton."

Mr. Lowther's "place" was the same lodging which he had taken for himself when he first returned to England. He was an adventurer, but he was not a vulgar adventurer; and in all his dealings with Francis Tredethlyn he had not sponged upon that gentleman's purse for so much as a five-pound note. He had his plans; but they were not the plans of a man who lives from hand to mouth. He won a good deal of his friend's money; but he never cheated Francis out of a sixpence. His sole advantage was that which must always accompany skill and experience as opposed to ignorance and inexperience. In the mean while, Harcourt Lowther lived as best he might on his winnings and a small allowance made him by his mother.

The Lowthers were great people in their way, and Harcourt had admission to some of the best houses in London. He was very well received in that circle in which Maude had taken her place, and contrived somehow or other to be present for an hour or so at almost all of the parties in which she appeared; though to break away from the haunts of Bohemianism to drop into polite life, and then return to Bohemia in the same evening, was almost as difficult as a harlequin's jump in a pantomime. Harcourt Lowther did this, however, and did it very often; and Maude, enjoying all the privileges of a matron, found herself sometimes standing amongst the statues and exotics on a crowded staircase in Tyburnia, talking with Harcourt Lowther almost as familiarly as they had talked in the old summer evenings by the quiet river.

Sometimes, looking back upon such a meeting, Maude felt inclined to be angry with Mr. Lowther for having taken something of the old tone; but could she blame him for the lowered accents of his voice, the subdued light in his eyes, the unconscious tenderness into which he was betrayed in those public meetings, when she remembered how nobly he kept aloof from her in her home? Never yet had he presumed upon his intimacy with the husband in order to intrude himself on the presence of the wife. What harm or danger, then, if, in crowded assemblages, he surmounted all manner of small difficulties in order to make his way to her side? What could it matter if he lingered just a little longer than others, contriving all sorts of excuses for delay? It is rather a pleasant thing for a frivolous young married woman, serene in the consciousness of her own integrity, to know that a man's heart is breaking for her in a gentlemanly way. A word too much, a tone, a look, and Maude would have taken alarm, and fled from her old admirer as from the venomous fangs of some deadly reptile; but Harcourt Lowther knew better than to speak that word. He had his own plans, and he was carrying them out in his own way; neither by word nor look had he ever offended Maude Tredethlyn; but now, when he tried to cut a path for himself through the crowd about her, he found less difficulty in the progress. People began to make way for him, and it was considered a settled thing that he should be found somewhere near her. He had not offended her; he had only—compromised her.

Francis awoke before the hour at which his servant had been told to call him. The valet's place was almost a sinecure, for the Cornishman still retained, of his old nature, the simple, independent habits of a man who can wait upon himself. He got up at four o'clock, and had nearly completed his toilet when the servant brought the soda and brandy prescribed by Harcourt Lowther.

"And if you please, sir, you were to be so good as to remember an appointment with Mr. Lowther at half-past five, and was to please to drive the mail phaeton," said the valet, while his master drank the revivifying beverage.

"Very good," muttered Mr. Tredethlyn, with something like a groan; "you may go and order the phaeton for five o'clock. Is Mrs. Tredethlyn at home?"

"No, sir."

The man departed, and Francis finished dressing. He had ten minutes to spare after putting on his outer coat, and he sat down to look at the newspaper which lay ready cut on his writing-table. He took up the Times, but only stared vacantly at the advertisement sheet. His head still ached, in spite of a shower-bath and a vigorous application of hard hair-brushes; but his intellect was a good deal clearer than it had been before he dressed.

Suddenly, out of the advertisement sheet, vivid as the figure of Banquo at Macbeth's uncomfortable supper-party, there arose before him a face—a wan, faded face—in a white muslin cap.

"Great Heaven!" he cried; "I didn't know her!"

The ghost that he had seen upon the previous night was the ghost of the woman he had so long been looking for—his cousin Susan.

ONE OF THE OBITUARIES.

FROM the editorial columns of one of our exchanges published in Pennsylvania, we have gleaned a morceau which deserves an extended circulation. It is one of those post mortem gems which are occasionally squeezed from the grief-stricken minds of embryo panegyrists, but contrary to the custom generally observed in obituary notices, is in plain prose, unadorned by the solemn "suffering-sore-long time-he-bore" style. If the lamented Lewis can rest easy in his grave after the pronunciation of such an eulogy by so graphic and eloquent a recorder as N. B. W., he must be dead indeed. Read it:

DEATH OF JOSEPH B. LEWIS.

MR. RAMBO: Permit me to announce the death of Mr. Joseph B. Lewis, an old citizen and native of Columbia, through the columns of the Spy. Mr. Lewis died in this city on the 25th ult., in the 50th year of his age. He was well known to most of the old citizens of Columbia, and will be remembered as one of George Darling's apprentices at the plastering business; and also for having punished Coby Greer, the swaggering Bully Butcher of Philadelphia, at a Lancaster Fair, while yet a mere stripling of a boy.

Having handled the "hawk and darby" with Lewis, I know him to be an excellent workman. He was more than a common man, in strength, in activity, in a fight, in shuffling and dealing cards, or in bestowing gifts to relieve the wants of the needy.

He could rapidly grasp from a pile of lead pencils, twelve at every grasp, and make no mistakes, and he could deal cards from the top and bottom of a pack so rapidly, as to defy detection of those but skilled in card craft. In this department of prestidigitation, I think he had no superior that I ever knew.

He has been known to play whisky poker three consecutive days in succession without losing a trick, turning up Jack every time. Once, for the amusement of his friends, he stood four hours upon his head, and while in that position drank thirty glasses of mixed lager and whisky, spiced with red pepper. He then turned a double somersault backwards, alighting upon the top of a flour barrel, and then rebounding, actually, by sheer strength of his muscles, lifting the barrel up with him several feet.

The present popular Mayor of Cincinnati, Col. Lew Harris; the late General Welsh, of Columbus, and Joseph Lewis, the deceased, were three mechanics working together in this city when the war with Mexico was declared. The three enlisted at the same time. Harris won a Captaincy, Welsh a Lieutenantancy, and Lewis imprisonment in the castle of Perote, for disobeying the orders of Joe Lane, given when he was drunk. He played himself out of this scrape by a game of old sledge with the guard, then proceeded to Chepultepec, where he acquired great proficiency in grabbing up more lead pencils and other things lying around loose.

After the war Lewis and Harris returned to Cincinnati. Harris became a public man, and Lewis worked at his trade whenever he couldn't get anything else to do.

While arranging some stucco work to the outside cornice of one of our public buildings, the scaffolding gave way. He gave a clean, springing leap to clear the entanglements of the falling timber of the scaffold, and landed sixty feet in the street from where he sprang. He lighted on his feet and hands, in a half sitting posture. He was terribly crushed. Both legs, both arms, were broken, and the bones intruded through the lacerated muscles. Two or three of the vertebra of the back were also dislocated; four of his ribs were split or broken, one of his eyes poked out, besides other injuries, internal and external, of an exceedingly painful and dangerous character. Some of the attending physicians gave it as their opinion that it would be necessary to take his backbone out, scrape it, and replace the broken vertebra with wooden ones. The split in his ribs was mended with small rivets. He became a cripple for life, and an object of charity for two or three years. The firemen nobly sustained him during the period of his disability. He turned his attention to shoemaking, and with a little instructions was qualified, and got a seat in "cacks," which enabled him to again taste the sweet bread of independence, and enjoy the wealth of honest labor. He stuck to "cacks" a few months, when "cacks" being dull, and the rivets in his ribs becoming loose, he abandoned "cacks," and soon after received an appointment from Mayor Hatch as Inspector and Measurer of Wood on the river landing, which enabled him to live quite comfortable. The present Mayor (Harris) re-appointed him to the same position, which he continued to occupy until he died.

About this time another of the vertebra of his backbone was loosened, and working its way downwards, came out through the great toe of his left leg. The muscles of his arms became inextricably tangled with the veins, and he was obliged to forego card shuffling altogether. This was a sad blow. He could neither sit, lie down, nor stand up for thirteen months, five weeks, eight days, twenty-seven hours, thirty-one minutes and sixty-three seconds. At the close of this period a general debility gradually wasted the spirit, which was wont to be exuberant. He gradually failed in health, still his great character would show itself as an expiring flame in a blackened socket occasionally, but only to exhibit the more vividly its decay and exhaustion.

The candle of life, burning so low and dim, was snuffed in vain by the doctors. Ninety-six plasters placed upon his body rallied him a little; but a relapse came, and one morning he took his last quid of tobacco, closed his eyes, threw up his accounts and departed this life in the hope of a blessed immortality, where there are no dislocated back bones and cheap cacks, where Coby Greers and old sledge are unknown. "I will sleep now!" were his last words, and after life's fitful fever he required repose.

The Mayor had him buried at our beautiful Spring Grove Cemetery, in the Firemen's lot, where all that is mortal of him, mingles with its fraternal dust. The other part of him, we in trembling hope repose, has gone to the bosom of his Father and his God.

A very eventful life has thus passed away. Let no man say without some hesitation: "Thou art better than I!" Lewis was a better man than he seemed; most men seem better than they are, especially on Sunday. Harris always did. But let us

"No further seek his merits to disclose
Or draw his frailties from their dread abode."

A FIRE-EATER DISPOSED OF.—A singular incident occurred at the Cafe Francaise in 1816, at the corner of the Rue Laffitte. A celebrated duellist entered and began insulting all the persons who were seated at dinner; he boasted of his courage, and declared his determination to kill a certain M. de F—. A gentleman present, disgusted at such braggart insolence, quietly walked up to this fire-eater, and addressed him thus: "As you are such a dangerous customer, perhaps you will accommodate me, by being punctual at the entrance to the Bois de Boulogne, near the Porte Maillot, at mid-day to-morrow: earlier I cannot get there, but depend upon my arriving in due time with swords and pistols." The duellist began to demur, saying he did not know what right a stranger had to take up the cudgels of M. de F—; to which the gentleman replied, "I have done so because I am anxious to rid society of a dangerous fellow like yourself, and would recommend you before you go to bed to make your will. I will undertake to order your coffin and pay your funeral expenses." He then gave the waiter a note of 1,000 francs, with the injunction that his orders should be executed before eleven the following day. This had the desired effect of intimidating the bully who left Paris the following day, and never more was heard of or seen in public.—Gronow's Recollections.

THE THREE DICTATORS.—A private letter from Paris states that at a masked ball lately, three men personating Julius Caesar, Charlemagne, and Napoleon I. respectively, were walking arm in arm, amidst roars of laughter. Caesar was dressed like an ancient Roman exquisite, and scratched his head with his fingers. When the crowd interrupted their movements the great Roman rebuked them with humorous gravity by saying, "Happy the people who understand and obey us; woe to those who disregard and oppose us."

WHAT IS A WATERSHED?—As a Scotsman I am surprised at the difficulty raised as to the legitimacy of "watershed." To my ear it has ever been a reasonable and expressive word. In a Glasgow nursery, "O, please shed my hair," "Come here, bairn, and let me shed your hair," "Lassie, when will you learn to shed your hair straight?" and "Mary, shed my back hair, and I'll shed yours," were most familiar sounds. Hence the application of the term to the partition of waters has always yielded to my mind a ready and graphic sense.

SAN FRANCISCO, SATURDAY, MAY 6, 1865.

A SHEAF OF BLUNDERS.

WE had fondly imagined that "Eusebius," the Art Critic of the Alta, was, like the fabled Phoenix, a solitary and isolated specimen, occurring at rare and uncertain intervals. But it would seem that "Bullion," who has lately appeared in behalf of Government Architecture, in the same paper, is a coincident member of the family. Bullion's article, perhaps, displays a greater facility for blundering than Eusebius. It certainly was an effort of genius that packed into the following sentence this sheaf of blunders:

"Great as all civilization regards the majestic statue of Moses in the Pantheon of St. Peter's, and that sublime work, by the same hand, The Last Judgment, painted in fresco upon its ceiling, the unrivalled genius who called these sublime creations into existence, pointed to the lofty dome suspended in air above them as his greatest triumph of art, upon which he was content to rest his reputation in ages to come."

The application of the term "Pantheon" to St. Peter's, dedicated to one God, is perhaps the most trifling error. But the statue of "Moses" happens to be in the church of San Pietro in Vincolo, some distance from St. Peter's. "The Last Judgment" adorns the end wall, and not the ceiling of the Sistine Chapel, which is quite another and remoter edifice. There are no frescoes on the dome of St. Peter's; its wall pictures are all mosaic. The singular attitude of the "unrivalled genius" pointing to those distant objects and his inconsequent remark, affords a melancholy spectacle of imbecility which all lovers of art will shrink from contemplating.

But not only in classical art does Bullion exhibit his masterly misinformation. He ignores the existence of Mullet, Assistant Architect of the Treasury:

"We were some ten or twelve years since familiar with the operations and machinery of the United States Treasury, but such a novel appendage as an 'Architect,' or his 'Assistant,' in that Department, was then unheard of. During the Secretaryship of Mr. Corwin, Mr. Fillmore one day took it into his head to go the rounds of the Government strong-box, and devoted an afternoon to the purpose. A clerk in one of the Bureaus, who had his desk in one of the basement offices, meeting his chief shortly after, remarked with no little share of pride, 'Governor, the President paid us all a visit to-day!' 'Ah,' replied 'Black Tom,' corrugating his brows, and twisting his mouth with that inimitable expression for which he was famous, 'I suppose he wanted to see how a Treasury worked—whether it was run on the same plan of that old felling mill he served an apprenticeship in.' The financial affairs of the General Government are regulated in this Department—greenbacks are printed to meet the wants of the Government, and various other functions and attributes belonging to it: but such an officer as 'Architect of the U. S. Treasury Department,' was never heard of until mentioned in the connection referred to."

What connection this anecdote has with the foregoing we are at a loss to conceive, or by what rule Bullion uses it as a sequitur to his assertions, except it be to prove his previous connection with the Department, which nobody seems to care to deny. As to the fact, appropriations show that under Guthrie there was a Supervising Architect of the Treasury.

PROVIDENCE VS. SATAN, ET AL.—An anonymous writer in the Morning Call thinks the CALIFORNIAN's editorial on the assassination of the President, blasphemous. As the writer has recorded his impressions, rather than his arguments, we have nothing to say except that even those impressions have not the merit of originality. It has been the habit of a certain class of rebel sympathizers to imply blasphemous qualities to all loyalty that attributed any connexion between Providence and Right. Similar sentiments have been advanced in papers now extinct, and if the writers have unhappily outlived their old vehicle of expression and choose to transfer their old formulas to the Call, we are not bound to give them that attention which novelty might demand. The writer asks somewhat anxiously "where Satan was when Providence usurped his prerogative?" As we have confined ourselves with endeavoring to transcribe what seemed to us to be the decree of Providence, we leave the writer to chronicle the movements of his own party.

BUSINESS NOTICE.—Mr. J. P. Bogardus has been admitted as a member of the CALIFORNIAN Printing and Publishing Company.

OPERA MATTERS.

"TROVATORE," as given on Monday night by the Bianchi troupe, was an improvement on former performances. Some of the concerted pieces were spiritedly executed. In the more robustious passages Bianchi displayed considerable power, particularly as he is often obliged to force his voice—somewhat worn by continued labor. The serenade in the first act was a little too demonstrative for the same reason. It is unfortunate, as Bianchi is a fine artist. Madame Bianchi rather overacted "Azucena." The Opera was more completely given than was the custom of late, and the charming Nun's Chorus, which has been usually omitted, was sung with fine effect.

The new Italian Opera troupe opened with the same opera at the Academy of Music on the following evening, and were enthusiastically received. Adelaide Philips, though not as fresh in voice as in the days of her Eastern triumphs, was pre-eminently good—the first of the troupe—the finest contralto voice ever heard on this coast—the best "Azucena" ever presented to a California audience. Her tragic action was powerful but well controlled; her execution of the famous "Stride la Vampa," and the duet in the last scene a most exquisite performance. The prima donna with a sweet soprano voice, well cultivated, but not particularly powerful, did not seem to rise to the dramatic intensity of her role, a fault that in Traviata on Thursday night she more than atoned for. The tenor, Sbriglia, though not always happy in his embellishments of the composer's score, sings in good style, with a quality of voice that has improved on acquaintance, and which is evidently capable of greater effect than he has yet succeeded in giving it. Orlandini, baritone, made a favorable impression, and sang "Il Balen" admirably. De Haga's "Fernando" was a good performance.

The acting of La Traviata on Thursday night strengthened the reputation of the tenor and soprano. Signora Sconcia's physique seemed admirably adapted to her role; she appeared to have a true and artistic conception of the character, and gave to the sentimental pathos of the story that exquisite expression which Verdi has made so charming in music, but which is apt to be overstrained in dialogue. This evening Trovatore will be given instead of Lucrezia Borgin, which would have brought forward the charming contralto in the role of Maffio Orsini.

THE SAN FRANCISCO BENEVOLENT ASSOCIATION.—The machinery of this praiseworthy charity has been perfected, and the organization is now in complete working order. The Directory issued by the Association embraces a summary statement of its object and principles, which, while providing for the speedy and ample relief of the destitute, exercise a system of wholesome checks on all imposture and professional mendicancy. The design "to make the poor a party to their own improvement and elevation" is an intelligent movement in the right direction. While we wish the society all possible success, we trust it will not entirely supersede other channels of benevolence. The only drawback to this large ticket-giving system is its tendency to make a business of charity and to work a certain evil to both donor and recipient by substituting forms and third parties for the actual contact of kindly sympathy which lends to the gift half its value. The man who gives money into a fund for charitable purposes loses much of the rich experience of giving, as well as the influence of gratitude upon himself, while the man who takes from a fund is apt to lose that direct personal responsibility which he would have toward an individual almoner, and to find his sense of gratitude somewhat confused. Paupers do not cherish kindly feelings to almshouses, nor do the tax-payers indulge in much moral sentiment in paying their yearly dues. For all this, almshouses are necessary adjuncts of civilization, and the Benevolent Society, if it succor actual starvation and want, can dispense with the sentimental aspect of almsgiving for some time to come.

GENERAL LEE'S OPINIONS.—It appears that the New York Herald's correspondent called on General Lee to obtain his political views. This interview of a paroled prisoner and a newspaper reporter must have been of tremendous political significance. The operator at Chicago evidently thinks so, as we have the entire views of the rebel General as what should be the policy of the Government, prefaced by the modest statement that he is not a politician. It is to be regretted that the able remarks of our own correspondent have not been preserved, to be transmitted to posterity or transferred to the archives of the State Department. Perhaps during Mr. Seward's illness, this remarkable young person might be induced to act for the Secretary. With Sherman to make treaties, and the New York Herald's correspondent to confer with rebel leaders, we may truly echo Gen. Lee's half-threat in regard to any probable arbitrary policy of the Government, that "the end is not yet."

We are under obligations to A. J. Doolittle for a correct and beautiful official Township Map of the county of Humboldt.

THEATRICAL TALK.

ON Monday the comic drama of Sybilla, or Step by Step, was produced at Maguire's Opera House. It is a capital piece, but did not draw very good houses, perhaps in consequence of being injudiciously cast. The character of "Sybilla," an earnest, determined woman with remarkable powers of coquetry, was quite unsuited to the gentle Mrs. Sophie Edwin, who is so charming in all characters where pathos and kindly womanly feeling are required, but in dashing parts, which require the representation of any of the lower characteristics of feminine nature, is sadly out of her element. Mrs. Perry would have been far more at home in the character of "Sybilla," the bar maid of Red Ox Tavern, and would have done the part justice. The best played part in the piece was that of "Joachin Barke," taken by Mr. Aldrich, who filled it capitably. Sybilla was withdrawn after a slow run of three nights. On Thursday Mr. Aldrich took his first benefit in California, and, though the house was not by any means as good a one as his merits entitled him to, taking into consideration the attractions offered at the Academy of Music, it was pretty fair. The bill for the occasion consisted of The Captain of the Watch and The Three Guardsmen, both of which were played to the entire satisfaction of the audience, the beneficeaire particularly distinguishing himself in the character of "Cardinal Richelieu" in the latter play. Friday night was devoted to another benefit, Mr. John E. Johnson, the comic singer, formerly such a wonderful favorite with Californians before sickness robbed him of his powers, being the recipient. A capital evening's entertainment was given and a large number of Mr. Johnson's old friends mustered for the occasion, glad to have an opportunity of expressing their friendship and respect for one, who in early days, had afforded them such rare amusement. Little Jennie Worrell and Otto Burbank, who volunteered for the occasion, appeared in "a grand olio" of songs and dances between the performance of the comedy of Married Life, and the afterpiece of the imitation scene from the Widow's Victim, in which Mr. Frank Mayo as "Jerry Clip," and Mrs. Perry as "Jane Chatterly," kept the audience in fits of laughter from its commencement until the fall of the curtain. This afternoon and evening, Dior Boucicault's drama of the Poor of New York, which has for months past been played to crowded houses in the East, will be presented. On Monday Mr. Dan. Setchell makes his first appearance in Ici on Parle Francais and One Thousand Milliners Wanted. The fame of this comedian is wide spread, and a full house will doubtless greet him on his first appearance. Mr. Setchell bears a wonderful resemblance to the celebrated English comedian Buckstone; if he possesses the talent as well as the appearance of Buckstone, and avoids the mannerisms which so much detract from his powers of pleasing, San Franciscan play-goers have a rich treat in store for them. Genuine low comedy, is a thing we have not witnessed here for many a day, and will be a pleasing relief after the late tregical season.

The American has been running burlesque and drawing fair houses during the week.

The Circus will remain but a few days longer, Monday, Tuesday and Wednesday of next week being positively the last three days. The last afternoon performance takes place to-day. Those who have not yet witnessed the laughable performances of the educated dogs and monkeys, the miraculous gymnastic feats of Olma, the wonderful double somersault of Mr. Barry, and the other attractive performances to be seen at this ne plus ultra of "circei," should avail themselves of the short time during which it will remain here. It is worth while paying a visit to the circus if only to listen to the polished and elegant witticisms of Mr. James Cooke, the best jester who has ever visited this coast.

TOUCHSTONE.

MAY FESTIVALS.—Numerous picnics have been held during the past week, which have all passed off pleasantly. The Festival in aid of the Sanitary Fund on Monday last was the largest and most successful. The Olympic Club and the Good Templars have also held their annual gathering under the green trees of Alameda. To-morrow the Irish American Benevolent Society will celebrate their fifth anniversary by a Festival at Angel Island. Their former picnics have always proved mammoth successes, and this will doubtless prove the same. The steamer Clinton also makes an excursion trip to San Quentin, the proceeds of which go to the benefit of the San Quentin school. The Sixth German Regiment will hold their Regimental excursion festival at the Encinal to-morrow. The Ladies hold a fair and festival at Oakland, during the coming week, for the benefit of St. Mary's church, of that place. Crescent Engine Company, No. 10, are to have their excursion May 14th, to Martinez.

FRENCH LECTURES.—Professor Miel, of the South Park Institute and Kindergarten, is to deliver a series of French lectures on Corneille, Victor Hugo, DeSeigne, George Sand, etc., etc. Reference to our advertising columns will show the order of their delivery. Prof. Miel has previously lectured in this city, and is fully competent for the task.

IMPORTANT CORRESPONDENCE

BETWEEN MR. MARK TWAIN OF SAN FRANCISCO, AND REV. BISHOP HAWKS, D.D., OF NEW YORK, REV. PHILLIPS BROOKS OF PHILADELPHIA, AND REV. DR. CUMMINGS OF CHICAGO, CONCERNING THE OCCUPANCY OF GRACE CATHEDRAL.

FOR a long time I have taken a deep interest in the efforts being made to induce the above-named distinguished clergymen—or, rather, some one of them—to come out here and occupy the pulpit of the noble edifice known as Grace Cathedral. And when I saw that the vestry were uniformly unsuccessful, although doing all that they possibly could to attain their object, I felt it my duty to come forward and throw the weight of my influence—such as it might be—in favor of the laudable undertaking. That by so doing I was not seeking to curry favor with the vestry—and that my actions were prompted by no selfish motive of any kind whatever—is sufficiently evidenced by the fact that I am not a member of Grace Church, and never had any conversation with the vestry upon the subject in hand, and never even hinted to them that I was going to write to the clergymen. What I have done in the matter I did of my own free will and accord, without any solicitation from anybody, and my actions were dictated solely by a spirit of enlarged charity and good feeling toward the congregation of Grace Cathedral. I seek no reward for my services; I desire none but the approval of my own conscience and the satisfaction of knowing I have done that which I conceived to be my duty, to the best of my ability.

M. T.

The correspondence which passed between myself and the Rev. Dr. Hawks was as follows:

LETTER FROM MYSELF TO BISHOP HAWKS.

SAN FRANCISCO, March, 1865.

REV. DR. HAWKS—Dear Doctor.—Since I heard that you have telegraphed the vestry of Grace Cathedral here, that you cannot come out to San Francisco and carry on a church at the terms offered you, viz: $7,000 a year, I have concluded to write you on the subject myself. A word in your ear: say nothing to anybody—keep dark—but just pack up your traps and come along out here—I will see that it is all right. That $7,000 dodge was only a bid—nothing more. They never expected you to clinch a bargain like that. I will go to work and get up a little competition among the cloth, and the result of it will be that you will make more money in six months here than you would in New York in a year. I can do it. I have a great deal of influence with the clergy here, and especially with the Rev. Dr. Wadsworth and the Rev. Mr. Stebbins—I write their sermons for them. [This latter fact is not generally known, however, and maybe you had as well not mention it.] I can get them to strike for higher wages any time.

You would like this berth. It has a greater number of attractive features than any I know of. It is such a magnificent field, for one thing—why, sinners are so thick that you can't throw out your line without hooking several of them; you'd be surprised—the flattest old sermon a man can grind out is bound to corral half a dozen. You see, you can do such a land-office business on such a small capital. Why, I wrote the most rambling, incomprehensible harangue of a sermon you ever heard in your life for one of the Episcopalian ministers here, and he landed seventeen with it at the first dash; then I trimmed it up to suit Methodist doctrine, and the Rev. Mr. Thomas got eleven more; I tinkered the doctrinal points again, and Stebbins made a lot of Unitarian converts with it; I worked it over once more, and Dr. Wadsworth did almost as well with it as he usually does with my ablest compositions. It was passed around, after that, from church to church, undergoing changes of dress as before, to suit the vicissitudes of doctrinal climate, until it went the entire rounds. During its career we took in, altogether, a hundred and eighteen of the most objectionable characters that ever traveled on the broad road to destruction.

You would find this a remarkably easy berth—one man to give out the hymns, another to do the praying, another to read the chapter from the Testament—you would have nothing in the world to do but read the litany and preach—no, not read the litany, but sing it. They sing the litany here, in the Pontifical Grand Mass style, which is pleasanter and more attractive than to read it. You need not mind that, though; the tune is not difficult, and requires no more musical taste or education than is required to sell "Twenty-four—self-sealing—envelopes—for f-o-u-r cents," in your city. I like to hear the litany sung. Perhaps there is hardly enough variety in the music, but still the effect is very fine. Bishop Kip never could sing worth a cent, though. However, he has gone to Europe now to learn. Yes, as I said before, you would have nothing in the world to do but preach and sing that litany; and, between you and me, Doc, as regards the music, if you could manage to ring in a few of the popular and familiar old tunes that the people love so well you would be almost certain to create a sensation. I think I can safely promise you that. I am satisfied that you could do many a thing that would attract less attention than would result from adding a spirited variety to the music of the litany.

Your preaching will be easy. Bring along a barrel of your old obsolete sermons; the people here will never know the difference.

Drop me a line, Hawks; I don't know you, except by reputation, but I like you all the same. And don't you fret about the salary. I'll make that all right, you know. You need not mention to the vestry of Grace Cathedral, though, that I have been communicating with you on this subject. You see, I do not belong to their church, and they might think I was taking too much trouble on their account—though I assure you, upon my honor, it is no trouble in the world to me; I don't mind it; I am not busy now, and I would rather do it than not. All I want is to have a sure thing that you get your rights. You can depend upon me. I'll see you through this business as straight as a shingle; I haven't been drifting around all my life for nothing. I know a good deal more than a boiled carrot, though I may not appear to. And although I am not of the elect, so to speak, I take a strong interest in these things, nevertheless, and I am not going to stand by and see them come any seven-thousand-dollar arrangement over you. I have sent them word in your name that you won't take less than $18,000, and that you can get $25,000 in greenbacks at home. I also intimated that I was going to write your sermons—I thought it might have a good effect, and every little helps, you know. So you can just pack up and come along—it will be all right—I am satisfied of that. You needn't bring any shirts, I have got enough for us both. You will find there is nothing mean about me—I'll wear your clothes, and you can wear mine, just the same as so many twin brothers. When I like a man, I like him, and I go my death for him. My friends will all be fond of you, and will take to you as naturally as if they had known you a century. I will introduce you, and you will be all right. You can always depend on them. If you were to point out a man and say you did not like him, they would carve him in a minute.

Hurry along, Bishop. I shall be on the lookout for you, and will take you right to my house and you can stay there as long as you like, and it shan't cost you a cent.

Very truly, yours,

MARK TWAIN.

REPLY OF BISHOP HAWKS.

NEW YORK, April, 1865.

MY DEAR MARK.—I had never heard of you before I received your kind letter, but I feel as well acquainted with you now as if I had known you for years. I see that you understand how it is with us poor laborers in the vineyard, and feel for us in our struggles to gain a livelihood. You will be blessed for this—you will have your reward for the deeds done in the flesh—you will get your deserts hereafter. I am really sorry I cannot visit San Francisco, for I can see now that it must be a pleasant field for the earnest worker to toil in; but it was ordered otherwise, and I submit with becoming humility. My refusal of the position at $7,000 a year was not precisely meant to be final, but was intended for what the ungodly term a "flyer"—the object being, of course, to bring about an increase of the amount. That object was legitimate and proper, since it so nearly affects the interests not only of myself but of those who depend upon me for sustenance and support. Perhaps you remember a remark I made once to a vestry who had been solicited to increase my salary, my family being a pretty large one: they declined, and said it was promised that Providence would take care of the young ravens. I immediately retorted, in my happiest vein, that there was no similar promise concerning the young Hawks, though! I thought it was very good, at the time. The recollection of it has soiced many a weary hour since then, when all the world around me seemed dark and cheerless, and it is a source of tranquil satisfaction to me to think of it even at this day.

No; I hardly meant my decision to be final, as I said before, but subsequent events have compelled that result in spite of me. I threw up my parish in Baltimore, although it was paying me very handsomely, and came to New York to see how things were going in our line. I have prospered beyond my highest expectations. I selected a lot of my best sermons—old ones that had been forgotten by everybody—and once a week I let one of them off in the Church of the Annunciation here. The spirit of the ancient sermons bubbled forth with a bead on it and permeated the hearts of the congregation with a new life, such as the worn body feels when it is refreshed with rare old wine. It was a great hit. The timely arrival of the "call" from San Francisco insured success to me. The people appreciated my merits at once. A number of gentlemen immediately clubbed together and offered me $10,000 a year, and agreed to purchase for me the Church of St. George the Martyr, up town, or to build a new house of worship for me if I preferred it. I closed with them on these terms, my dear Mark, for I feel that so long as not even the little sparrows are suffered to fall to the ground unnoticed, I shall be mercifully cared for; and besides, I know that come what may, I can always eke out an existence so long as the cotton trade holds out as good as it is now. I am in cotton to some extent, you understand, and that is one reason why I cannot venture to leave here just at present to accept the position offered me in San Francisco. You see I have some small investments in that line which are as yet in an undecided state, and must be looked after.

But time flies, Mark, time flies; and I must bring this screed to a close and say farewell—and if forever, then forever fare thee well. But I shall never forget you, Mark—never!

Your generous solicitude in my behalf—your splendid inventive ability in conceiving of messages to the vestry calculated to make them offer me a higher salary—your sublime intrepidity in tendering those messages as having come from me—your profound sagacity in chaining and riveting the infatuation of the vestry with the intimation that you were going to write my sermons for me—your gorgeous liberality in offering to divide your shirts with me and to make common property of all other wearing apparel belonging to both parties—your cordial tender of your friends' affections and their very extraordinary services—your noble hospitality in providing a home for me in your palatial mansion—all these things call for my highest admiration and gratitude, and call not in vain, my dearest Mark. I shall never cease to pray for you and hold you in kindly and tearful remembrance. Once more, my gifted friend, accept the fervent thanks and the best wishes of

REV. DR. HAWKS.

Writes a beautiful letter, don't he?

But when the Bishop uses a tabooed expression, and talks glibly about doing a certain thing "just for a flyer," don't he shoulder the responsibility of it on to "the ungodly," with a rare grace?

And what a solid comfort that execrable joke has been to his declining years, hasn't it? If he goes on thinking about it and swelling himself up on account of it, he will be wanting a salary after a while that will break any church that hires him. However, if he enjoys it, and really thinks it was a good joke, I am very sure I don't want to dilute his pleasure in the least by dispelling the illusion. It reminds me, though, of a neat remark which the editor of Harper's Magazine made three years ago, in an article wherein he was pleading for charity for the harmless vanity of poor devil scribblers who imagine they are gifted with genius. He said they didn't know but what their writing was fine—and then he says: "Don't poor Martin Farquhar Tupper fondle his platitudes and think they are poems?" That's it. Let the Bishop fondle his little joke—no doubt it is just as good to him as if it were the very soul of humor.

But I wonder who in the mischief is "St. George-the-Martyr-Up-Town?" However, no matter—the Bishop is not going to take his chances altogether with St. George-the-Martyr-Up-Town, or with the little sparrows that are subject to accidents, either—he has a judicious eye on cotton. And he is right, too. Nobody deserves to be helped who don't try to help himself, and "faith without works" is a risky doctrine.

Now, what is your idea about his last paragraph? Don't you think he is spreading it on rather thick?—as "the ungodly" would term it. Do you really think there is any rain behind all that thunder and lightning? Do you suppose he really means it? They are mighty powerful adjectives—uncommonly powerful adjectives—and sometimes I seem to smell a faint odor of irony about them. But that could hardly be. He evidently loves me. Why, if I could be brought to believe that that reverend old humorist was discharging any sarcasm at me, I would never write to him again as long as I live. Thanks I will "get my deserts hereafter"—I don't hardly like the ring of that, altogether.

He says he will pray for me, though. Well, he couldn't do anything that would fit my case better, and he couldn't find a subject who would thank him more kindly for it than I would. I suppose I shall come in under the head of "sinners at large"—but I don't mind that; I am no better than any other sinner and I am not entitled to especial consideration. They pray for the congregation first, you know—and with considerable vim; then they pray mildly for other denominations; then for the near relations of the congregation; then for their distant relatives; then for the surrounding community; then for the State; then for the Government officers; then for the United States; then for North America; then for the whole Continent; then for England, Ireland and Scotland; France, Germany and Italy; Russia, Prussia and Austria; then for the inhabitants of Norway, Sweden and Timbuctoo; and those of Saturn, Jupiter and New Jersey; and then they give the niggers a lift, and the Hindoos a lift, and the Turks a lift, and the Chinese a lift; and then, after they have got the fountain of mercy baled out as dry as an ash-hopper, they bespeak the sediment left in the bottom of it for us poor "sinners at large."

It ain't just exactly fair, is it? Sometimes, (being a sort of a Presbyterian in a general way, and a brevet member of one of the principal churches of that denomination,) I stand up in devout attitude, with downcast eyes, and hands clasped upon the back of the pew before me, and listen attentively and expectantly for awhile; and then rest upon one foot for a season; and then upon the other; and then insert my hands under my coat-tails and stand erect and look solemn; and then fold my arms and droop forward and look dejected; and then cast my eye furtively at the minister; and then at the congregation; and then grow absent-minded, and catch myself counting the lace bonnets; and marking the drowsy members; and noting the wide-awake ones; and averaging the bald heads; and afterwards descend to indolent conjectures as to whether the buzzing fly that keeps stumbling up the window-pane and sliding down backwards again will ever accomplish his object to his satisfaction; and, finally, I give up and relapse into a dreary reverie—and about this time the minister reaches my department, and brings me back to hope and consciousness with a kind word for the poor "sinners at large."

Sometimes we are even forgotten altogether and left out in the cold—and then I call to mind the vulgar little boy who was fond of hot biscuits, and whose mother promised him that he should have all that were left if he would stay away and keep quiet and be a good little boy while the strange guest ate his breakfast; and who watched that voracious guest till the growing apprehension in his young bosom gave place to demonstrated ruin, and then sung out: "There! I know'd how it was goin' to be—I know'd how it was goin' to be, from the start! Blamed if he hain't gobbled the last biscuit!"

I do not complain, though, because it is very seldom that the Hindoos and the Turks and the Chinese get all the atoning biscuits and leave us sinners at large to go hungry. They do remain at the board a long time, though, and we often get a little tired waiting for our turn. How would it do to be less diffuse? How would it do to ask a blessing upon the specialities—I mean the congregation and the immediate community—and then include the whole broad universe in one glowing, fervent appeal? How would it answer to adopt the simplicity and the beauty and the brevity and the comprehensiveness of the Lord's Prayer as a model? But perhaps I am wandering out of my jurisdiction.

The letters I wrote to the Rev. Phillips Brooks of Philadelphia, and the Rev. Dr. Cummings of Chicago, urging them to come here and take charge of Grace Cathedral, and offering them my countenance and support, will be published next week, together with their replies to the same.

MARK TWAIN.

SOMETHING LIKE A CONJUROR.

[We select the following extracts from an article in Once a Week. The principal actor is a Hindoo conjuror. The jugglers throughout Asia are all of one class, and their sons become jugglers or musicians, their daughters dancing girls, the secrets of the trade being handed down from father to son.]

PRIZE BALANCING.

THE old conjuror now said that, for his next trick, he must be somewhere out of the glare of the sun, and sheltered from any air which might be stirring. We accordingly adjourned to the verandah. The conjuror spread a piece of matting, and squatted, produced from his shawls a bag, and emptied it on the stone in front of him. The contents were a quantity of little bits of wood: some, lorked-like branches of a tree; some, straight; each a few inches long; besides these, there were some fifteen or twenty little painted wooden birds, about half an inch long. The old man chose one of the straightest and thickest of the bits of wood, and, turning his face up in the air, poised it on the tip of his nose. The little boys who sat by him henceforth handed him whatever he called for. First, two or three more pieces of wood, which he poised on the piece already there, then a forked piece, to which he gradually made additions, until he had built upon his nose a tree with two branches. He always kept its balance by adding simultaneously on each side, holding a piece in each hand, and never once taking his eyes off the fabric. Soon the two branches became four, the four eight, and so on, until a skeleton of a tree was formed about two feet high, and branching out so as to overshadow his whole face; he could just reach with his hands to put the topmost branches on. It was a wonderful structure, and we all held our breath as he added the last bits. But it was not done yet. The boys now handed him the little birds, and, still two at a time, one in each hand, he stuck them all over the tree. The complete immobility of his head and neck while he was balancing this structure on the tip of his nose, was something wonderful, and I think he must have breathed through his ears, for there was not the slightest perceptible motion about nose or mouth. After putting all the birds on, he paused, and we, thinking the trick was finished, began to applaud. But he held up his forefinger for silence. There was more to come. The boys put into one of his hands a short hollow reed, and into the other some dried peas. He then put a pea in his mouth, and using the reed as a pea shooter, took aim and shot off the branch one of the birds. The breath he gave was so gentle and well calculated that it gave no perceptible movement to his face; it just sent the pea far enough to hit a particular bird with perfect aim, and knock it over. Not another thing on the tree moved. Another pea was fired in the same way, and another bird brought down, and so on until all the birds were bagged. The fire was then directed at the branches and limbs of the tree, and, beginning from the topmost, the whole of this astonishing structure was demolished piecemeal even more wonderfully than its manner of erection.

A "TOUGH YOUTH."

He now said he would like to show us his son, who had a wonderful skin inside and out: it being, he assured us, "leather." He then shouted out for him, calling some outlandish name; but his followers, who evidently knew whom he wanted, shouted "Leather-fellow!" In a few moments a yellow-skinned boy of about twelve or fourteen appeared, dressed only with a bit of red calico round his loins. The old man asked whether we had any heavy weights, and we produced two bags of shot weighing about fourteen pounds each. He tied a piece of string to each of these, and a fish-hook at the other end of the string; then, telling him to go down on his hands and knees and put his head close to the ground, he put a fish-hook in the lobe of each ear, and the boy, slowly lifting his head, raised the shot-bags from the ground and moved along on his hands and knees. The ears did not bleed, but were drawn to a considerable length, and I expected to see the hooks tear out; but nothing happened. After he had crept some twenty yards, he returned, and the hooks were taken out of his ears. The next operation was more horrible to look at. The hooks were actually inserted in the upper eyelids, near the inner corner, and as the boy raised his head the eyelids were drawn half way down his cheeks. But he raised the bags by his eyelids, and moved along as before. A little of this sort of performance went a long way, and we soon cried "Enough."

SWORD SWALLOWING.

He now announced that the boy would swallow a sword. We had heard stories about the sword-blade's pushing up into the hilt, and so forth. We examined the sword closely, therefore, when it was produced. It was a common two-edged sword, about an inch broad and two feet long. The edges were very blunt, and the point was quite rounded. It was evidently kept for the purpose, but there was nothing false about the hilt. The boy first filled his mouth with ghee from a cup which one of our khitmutgars brought, and then stood bolt upright, with his face turned up, his mouth closed and full of ghee. The old man stood behind him, and inserted the point of the sword between his lips and teeth, and gradually pushed it down, until the hilt touched his teeth; the ghee had in the mean time run down his throat. We were now told to come and feel the sword in his stomach. We pressed our fingers just where the ribs separate in front, and there we could distinctly feel the end of the sword. As soon as we were satisfied, the sword was slowly drawn out, and, beyond a retch or two, the boy's inside did not seem to be upset by this skilful introduction of a thick probe through the gullet.

DISAPPEARANCE OF A BOY—THE NEW GYGES.

The old man now said he must bring the performances to a close, but before going would show us something more wonderful than anything we had seen yet.

"Sahibs," said he, "you saw me make the mango-tree grow out of the sand; in the same spot I will make this chokra," putting his hand on the head of the yellow leather-skinned boy, "disappear in the earth." We did not think it very likely that he could do this under our very noses without our discovering the trick. However, we arranged ourselves as before in the verandah, our servants and the old man's followers forming a semicircle in front of and facing us. In the centre of the semicircle sat the old conjuror; in front of him squatted the yellow-skinned boy. The conjuror now asked for a big basket, and one of our servants brought him an old hamper from the outhouse. He took it up and placed it over the boy so as to cover him altogether. At the moment of his doing this, I remembered afterwards that several persons clustered up round him as if to watch closely what he did. The instant the basket was on the old man said, "Does it press on you?" The peculiar shrill voice of the boy, which we had been hearing for the last half hour, answered from underneath, "Yes, it presses on my head." "Well, be quick and get into the earth," said the old man, "and don't keep the sahibs waiting." In about ten seconds the boy's voice said, "I can't get down, there is a stone in my way." "Nonsense," said the old man, "if you are not gone in two minutes, I'll flog you." The conversation went on for some minutes, the boy whining, and the old man scolding and getting angry. At last we said, "Oh, let the little brute out; you can't do the trick while we are watching, and we never thought you would."

This only made the old conjuror more angry. He began to curse and swear in Mahrattee frightfully, declaring he had never before failed in a trick. We laughed at him until he worked himself into a rage that was hideous to see. He tore his puggaree off, threw his arms about, and, all of a sudden, before we knew what he was going to do, he seized a spear from one of his followers and plunged it into the basket. A hideous scream came from underneath, and blood flowed out upon the sand. Then, seizing the spear, he jabbed it repeatedly through the basket, shrieks following every stroke. Blood flowed like water. We were astounded, for we did not know whether this was a trick or not. We called on our servants to seize the old fellow, but they seemed to be frightened, and at last two of us, jumping out of the verandah, rushed towards the scene of murder. The diabolical old man was so intent in jobbing in the spear, that he paid no attention to our coming. My comrade seized him by the throat. I rushed to the basket and picked it up. There was nothing under it. Only the ground was covered with blood. Our servants crowded round, and the old conjuror, as soon as he could get his throat from my friend's grip, said, "There, sahibs! I was determined to send that fellow into the earth, and as he wouldn't go quietly, I had to force him." We looked round in amazement. "But where's the boy?" we asked. "Down there," said the old man, pointing to the ground; "but he'll be back soon." Suddenly, we heard the boy's peculiar shrill voice in the distance, calling out, "Here I am, sahibs!" Everybody turned their heads in the direction, and there, running in at the gate of the compound, was the yellow-skinned boy. A present of ten rupees sent away the old conjuror and his party, delighted.

SCOTT'S HANDWRITING.—Scott's own penmanship afforded, during his prime, the most striking and irresistible proof how completely he must have submitted himself for some very considerable period to the mechanical discipline of his father's office. It spoke to months after months of his humble toil, as distinctly as the illegible scrawl of Lord Byron did to his self-mastery from the hour that he left Harrow. "There are some little technical tricks, such as no gentleman who has not been submitted to a similar regimen ever can fall into, which he practiced invariably while composing his poetry, which appear not unfrequently on the MSS. of his best novels, and which now and then dropped instinctively from his pen, even in the private letters and diaries of his closing years." Mr. Lockhart refers particularly to a sort of flourish at the bottom of the page, originally, he presumes, adopted in engrossing as a safeguard against the intrusion of a forged line between the legitimate text and the attesting signature. Sir Walter was quite sensible, it is added, that this ornament might as well be dispensed with; and his family often heard him murmur, while involuntarily performing it, "There goes the old shop again!"

The skating club of St. Petersburg gave a grand ball on the Neva. To the usual splendor of this festival was added a magnificent pavilion constructed of blocks of ice four feet thick, which being brilliantly lighted up in the interior, produced the effect of a palace of crystal.

OFFICIAL LITERATURE IN NEW HAMPSHIRE.

THE Boston Journal says: "Genius is bound to shine, whether men welcome its light or not, and its slumbering fires often break out when least expected. Evidence of this great fact comes to us just now from New Hampshire, where, in the modest town of Andover, lives a man who,

"To fortune and to fame unknown," certainly should not be longer unknown to fame at least. He has achieved local distinction, but the scintillations of his genius should be allowed to flash across a broader field than the narrow precincts of a rural township. This new light in the intellectual world fills the important offices of Town Treasurer and Superintending School Committee. His annual reports in these capacities, recently issued, furnish striking illustrations of his peculiar genius, which seems to consist of a remarkable development of the bumps of language and combativeness. Some of his efforts are unique.

In his report as Treasurer he gives a 'touch of his quality in a hit at office-seeking rivals, who would oust him from his position at the public crib. After stating that in consequence of 'various twistifications' growing out of the disordered state of the currency, he had lost some of the town's money, he remarks:

NONE OF YOUR BUSINESS.

"I put my hand in my pocket and replaced it, so the town is all right, and therefore it is none of your business: but I tell you of it (1) because it is true, and (2) because this community is not wholly exempt from a class of mental and moral pismires who ape the imperialism and claim the wisdom of Him who in the 'burning bush' was heard at Sinai. Their lips are ever parching with the fever of expectation—their eyeballs distended with hunger for some petty official position—unable to reach it as men do upon their merits, they resort to defamation and attempt to climb up by pulling others down. Contrary to their malevolent intentions, they ever build up what they seek to destroy. About all the prominence I ever had is owing to such howls of such jackals and hyenas."

LEGISLATIVE BRAINS.

"His next 'point' concerns that angust body, the higher branch of the Legislature, videlicet:

"The Davis case still hangs by the gills. Had the State Senate had as much brains as so many grasshoppers, it would have ended in August. I hope to have it off the docket in March."

"In his character as Superintending School Committee, our friend shines with fresh lustre. Read his description of

THE TOWN SCHOOL HOUSES.

"Scholars cannot be kept warm in the Beech Hill house in winter. The wind blows through as if it were a sieve. It is a perfect refrigerator. If the house is to be used, it ought to be put under ground in winter."

"The low roof and sand-patch location of the Turnpike House make it a capital baby-roaster in the heat of summer."

"The front of the Boston Hill house has been used for a woodshed. If the present efficient committee, and Rev. A. Buswell, former committee, are to be believed, that is all it is fit for."

"The antiquated inclined planes on which the seats are placed in the house on Tucker Mountain should be moved and the floor made level. Habits of uprightness can hardly be looked for under present disadvantages."

FLATULENT IN FRENCH.

"Kearsarge.—One term, five boys six girls. Book confusion at first. The established series at last. Small school. Much of its talent has let. Teacher scarcely 'sweet sixteen'; her first term. She is flatulent in French, 'posted' in algebra, proficient in Latin, a burrower in Greek, and, strange to say, her love for and knowledge of the common branches has in no wise abated. Very ambitious; very energetic; excellent order. Progress in all branches all that any one could have brought about in this school. Register correct. She richly earned her money."

EXCESSIVE HONESTY.

"Cilleyville.—Teacher has had some experience. She was excessively honest—she told me that she knew nothing of history. Would that many other pompous teachers would imitate her truthfulness. An excellent scholar in all else. She was so small I was afraid she could not manage the turbulent in this backward school, but she did, though I am unable to tell how. Great progress was made in all branches. Under her eye indifference became zeal and darkness became light. Her school was a splendid success; she earned at least three times the money she was paid, and the committee deserves a whipping at the cart's tail for not paying her more than he did. He probably thought a teacher should receive compensation according to size."

BIRCH NOT OF DIVINE ORIGIN.

"Turnpike.—The book chaos grew worse and worse, till scarcely two had the same kind of books in anything. I had to clear the Augean stable. From that time progress was very marked indeed—only the established list is now used. The first term was very quiet; the next very fair. The great sin of this teacher is that she does not consider the birch of divine origin. This year the cross currents whirled fearfully, but this time they did not touch the teacher and so destroy the school."

"We doubt if any other state can match our New Hampshire friend for independence and originality."

HOSTETTER'S CELEBRATED STOMACH BITTERS.

A TIMELY WARNING TO THE SICK.—It is especially important at this time, when the markets of the United States are flooded with the direst poisons, under the name of imported liquors, and when domestic compounds, purporting to be medicinal, but not a whit less pernicious, are heralded to the world as "sovereign remedies," that the public should fully understand the facts. Be it known, then, that while all the diffusive stimulants called liquors are impure, and all the Tonics containing alcohol are manufactured with a fiery article containing amyl or fusil oil, a mortal poison; HOSTETTER'S CELEBRATED STOMACH BITTERS contain none of these things, but are a combination of pure Essence of Rye with the pure juices of the most valuable stomachic, antibilious and aperient herbs and plants, and that as a safe and rapid remedy for Dyspepsia and all its kindred complaints, this preparation stands before the world without a rival or competitor. Its sales to-day are equal to the combined sales of all the other Tonics advertised in the United States, and the certificates which authenticate its usefulness are signed by individuals of the highest standing in every professional calling and walk of life. Beware of imitations and impostures.

FARRAND'S OSCILLATING

Amalgamator.

THIS UNRIVALLED IMPROVEMENT FOR THE REDUCTION and amalgamation of Gold and Silver Ores, is now running daily at No. 206 Commercial street, between Front and Davis.

THIS AMALGAMATOR INVOLVES

NO COMPLICATED MACHINERY

And possesses the following advantages over all others now in use:

1st It is capable of doing double the amount of work of the ordinary Pans, at a saving of more than one-half the power.

2d. It reduces the pulp finer, thereby producing a better result.

3d. It requires less quicksilver by one-half at a charge, whilst the loss by trituration is comparatively nothing.

4th. As an Amalgamator for gold contained in sulphurets, as also for very fine or flour gold, it has no equal.

5th. This Amalgamator involves no complicated machinery, and is less liable to get out of order than any of the pans.

DESCRIPTION OF FARRAND'S AMALGAMATOR.

In offering this Amalgamator to the public the inventor does not claim any new or scientific method of extracting the precious metals from the ores; he merely claims a new and simple combination of mechanical principles, whereby a great saving of power (full one-half in amount) is effected. The capacity of the machine varies with its size. The smallest, or prospecting size, will reduce 400 lbs. in three hours, and can be easily worked by the power of one man. The largest size will work 1,500 lbs in three hours, or six tons in 24 hours, with an application of a trifle more than one horse power. This saving of power, as all mill-men are aware, is an important consideration, particularly where fuel is scarce. The power so saved in running the Amalgamators may be advantageously employed to an increase of stamps, and thus proportionally increasing the work of the mill. This machine consists of a semi-cylindrical, trough-shaped vessel, in the interior of which is furnished with moveable concave dies, to be replaced when worn out, as in ordinary pans. The millers are convex, and attached to a substantial rock shaft, by which they are moved back and forward by crank or eccentric motion. The millers are held to their places by springs of moderate strength, the pressure of which may be easily regulated. The oscillating motion of the millers serves to keep the pulp in a constant state of agitation, thoroughly mixing it, and passing it under the millers without resort to any of the various expedients employed in Pans where a circular motion is maintained. The peculiar construction of this machine admits of its being worked with a much smaller charge of quicksilver, to any given amount of pulp than the flat-bottomed Pans. The spiral springs greatly assist in the work of reduction, by allowing the free admission of the pulp between the millers and dies, so that the pulp is made to actually work upon itself—as the dust of the diamond is made to reduce the gem itself. The advantage derived of thus avoiding all trituration in the presence of quicksilver, must be apparent to any one at all acquainted with gold or silver amalgamating.

Trials made with this machine in the presence of experts, during the last six months, have been pronounced highly satisfactory. It is peculiarly well adapted to employment by small mining operators in distant localities, as it can readily be taken to pieces and packed upon mules.

A large size machine is constructed without dies or millers, but simply with arms to act as stirrers, to be used in connection with several of the Amalgamators as a "Separator," as it is found that the peculiar motion given to these arms, in connection with the concave shape of the body of the machine, renders it most effectual for such a purpose.

THE WEEK'S DESPATCHES.

WE condense the telegraphic intelligence of the week, giving at a glance the progress of the closing movements of the war. Jeff. Davis, without an army, and trammelled only by his plunder, is making his way out of the country he has so deeply wronged, and perhaps is ere this applying for a dukedom in Maximilian's empire or endeavoring to find safety for a time in the island of Cuba:

A Washington correspondent of a New York paper gives the following particulars of Johnston's final surrender: "At six o'clock on the morning of the 25th, General Sherman notified Johnston that the terms were not accepted, and that the truce would end in forty-eight hours. Later in the day he sent another flag, demanding a surrender on the same terms accorded to Lee. Johnston replied on the 25th, asking an interview for modifying the previous agreement of surrendering the army. Sherman declined to discuss the subject on the basis of the old agreement, but named the time and place where he would meet him.

"They accordingly met near Dunham's Station, twenty-seven miles from Raleigh, on the 26th. Johnston was outspoken and frank in arranging the agreement for capitulation. A few minutes' conversation settled the preliminaries and the terms. These were soon reduced to writing and signed, and are the same as extended to Lee, although not expressed precisely in the same language. The negotiations were conducted in Sherman's name. Johnston had no intimation of the Lieutenant General's presence at Raleigh until after the terms of capitulation were signed, when Grant quietly put his approval on the back of them. During the interview between Sherman and Johnston, the latter uniformly declared that the war was over; that to continue it a moment longer would not only be wrong, but criminal; and that when the Southern people learned that his army and Lee's had surrendered, there would be none to counsel a longer continuance of the contest. He stated openly that his troops should fight no longer if he could obtain reasonably satisfactory terms, and that he would disband and send them home."

The terms granted to Johnston embrace the surrender of the four armies of the military division of the West, but excluding that of Dick Taylor, lying west of the Chattahoochee river. Among the Generals surrendered is Beauregard; the principal among the Lieut.-Generals is Hardee. Wade Hampton refused to be given up. Sixty-six General Officers are included, ranking as follows: Full Generals, 3; Lieut.-Generals, 5; Major-Generals, 20; Brigadier-Generals, 38. The total number is 27,000, although more names are given. All militia from South Carolina, North Carolina, Georgia and the Gulf States are included.

Newbern advices state that Johnston attempted to obtain terms from Grant which would provide for the pardon of Jeff. Davis and other leading insurrectionary conspirators, but the Lieut.-General would listen to nothing of the kind, and Johnston had to be satisfied with the conditions granted to Lee.

The last positive information of Jeff. Davis' movements was that he passed through Charlotte, on his way southward, escorted by a brigade of cavalry, probably Wade Hampton's, on the 23d. General Wilson was at Macon on the 20th, and virtually held all southern Georgia, so the chances are that Davis cannot escape. From certain indications it is probable that he will continue his flight south, and endeavor to reach Cuba in some small vessel or fishing boat from a point on the Florida coast, and rumor places a heavy sum to his bank account in Havana.

The Times' Washington special says the authorities are engaged in a most thorough investigation of the assassination plot, sending out in all directions. In the vicinity of Washington nearly two hundred persons have been arrested, principally from adjacent counties in Maryland.

Our Consul-General in Canada has given notice to the authorities that all criminals connected with the assassination of President Lincoln must be surrendered to the United States authorities.

Lee's paroled soldiers going home through the Shenandoah valley requested to be permitted to take the oath of allegiance. Many of Mosby's guerrillas have come into Winchester with the paroled soldiers, and among them his second in command, Lieut.-Col. Chambers.

The Macon, Atlanta and Columbus papers contain accounts of the march of Wilson's force up to the 20th. The rebels are represented as fighting hard, but were defeated, and lost West Point, Columbus and Montgomery. The West Point Railroad was burned. All bridges, rolling stock and the La-grange depot were burned, but no private property. The city of Griffin was surrendered by the Mayor.

Advices from New Orleans report that the rebel ram Webb passed New Orleans in broad daylight, at a rapid rate, displaying the Stars and Stripes. After passing she hoisted the rebel flag. When a few miles above Fort Phillip her condenser got out of order. She was then deserted and blown up.

One hundred and five officers and one thousand men of Morgan's old command surrendered to Gen. Hobson, at Mt. Sterling. Twelve hundred rebels also surrendered at other points to Gen. Hobson's troops. Several hundred deserters from the rebel army took the amnesty oath, and Eastern Kentucky is now clear of rebel troops.

Nine hundred rebels surrendered at Cumberland Gap, on the 28th of April, and were paroled.

An order from the War Department, signed by W. A. Nichols, A. A. G., has been issued, reducing the expenses of the military establishment, in view of the immediate reduction of the forces in field and garrison, and the speedy termination of hostilities.

The Herald's Selma (Ala.) dispatch says among the prisoners captured there were one hundred and fifty officers. Lieut.-Gen. Dick Taylor made his escape on the steamer N. B. Forrest. Dan. Adams, Roddy, Armstrong and Crosland, under cover of darkness, reached the swamp east of the city and eluded capture. The officers, comprising their staffs, were taken.

The correspondent of the N. Y. Herald, says: A post mortem examination of Booth's body showed that the ball which killed him, did not touch the brain, but, striking the spinal column, produced immediate paralysis. The opinion of the surgeon is that he must have died a horrible death, the brain being active and consciousness complete up to the very moment of dissolution. Nearly all the parties directly implicated are now in custody. Paine, the Seward assassin, is brother of one of the St. Albans raiders. There are six brothers in all, reckless and daring. Two were with Walker in Nicaragua.

A Washington telegram of the 27th of April, says that "Booth's body has been placed where it will never be seen by mortal eyes again."

In deference to the feelings of many Christians relative to Ascension Day, President Johnson has issued a proclamation appointing June 1st as a day of humiliation and prayer, instead of May 25th.

The Commercial's Washington special despatch says the vaults of the Farmer's Bank in Richmond have been opened and their contents found to be undisturbed.

A New Madrid telegram of April 28th, says the steamer Sultana exploded and sunk between there and Memphis. Twenty-two hundred people were on board, most of whom were paroled Union soldiers from the Anderson prison. Not more than nine hundred were saved. It is thought that an infernal machine had been put in the coal.

A despatch, dated April 19th, says an officer from Dick Taylor's staff arrived at Canby's headquarters to make terms for the surrender of Taylor's command.

Information has been received at the Navy Department that the rebel iron-clad Stonewall left Teneriffe on the 22d of April for the West Indies, and is supposed by this time to be in that locality.

THE INAUGURATION PROCESSION IN NEW YORK.—Frank Leslie's Illustrated Newspaper gives four views of the great commercial features of the inauguration procession, and says that the mechanical and industrial features of New York were never before so fully represented. As an evidence of how universally the working element entered into the spirit of the event, we quote its description of the demonstration made by the Singer Sewing Machine Manufacturing Company:

This company made a display in the procession—which we illustrate elsewhere—commensurate with the magnitude of its enormous business. They turned out one six-horse team, decorated with red, white and blue plumes, drawing a truck, upon which was erected a pavilion, covered and draped with the national colors, and in which eight young ladies were engaged in operating the Singer Sewing Machines, in the manufacture of army clothing. On either side of the pavilion was inscribed the following unique and telling motto:

"We clothe the Union armies, while Grant is 'dressing' the rebels."

Following this was a four-horse team gaily dressed, and two tandem teams, drawing the wagons of the company, loaded with Sewing Machines, directed to some of the principal branch houses located in the several quarters of the world, the whole preceded by a full band, and escorted by 1,000 men, employees of the company. The men marched in platoons, with guidons indicating the respective branches of the business to which they belonged.

Altogether, this was doubtless one of the most attractive, as it was the most extensive, display made by any one establishment in the city, and we doubt if it could be exceeded by any in the world. It is in keeping, however, with the well-known patriotism of the Singer Manufacturing Company.

THE BRADBURY PIANO.—Prominent among all the candidates for public favor stands the Wm. B. Bradbury Piano, an instrument in whose commendation too much cannot be said. It is scarcely two years since their manufacture was commenced, and in that short time they have become world-renowned, and have by sheer force of superior merit taken the lead as the acknowledged favorites in many portions of the United States. To say that they are in every respect splendid instruments, is a very mild statement of their value. The new scale adopted by Mr. Bradbury is the ac plus ultra of equalization, giving a perfect equality of tone ranging through the whole extent of the instrument. They are peculiarly distinguished for their breadth, purity, sweetness and bird-like quality of tone, and for their remarkable sustaining power. In elasticity of action they are unsurpassed, and testimonials from may eminent musicians accord to them all that is claimed by their maker—superiority over all others. Those who want a really first class instrument should call on or send to Wm. B. Bradbury.—N. Y. Independent.

INVESTING MONEY.—Many persons are unaware where or how to deposit their surplus money—the savings of economy and the results of labor. There are many solvent Loan Societies in the city which afford security and interest. Among them we recognize the California Building and Loan Society, of which Mr. Mooney is Secretary, as one based upon enduring and thoroughly solvent principles. It is a joint stock company, chartered for fifty years, has upwards of three hundred partners and a fixed capital of $250,000. No panic can possibly disable this society—its numerous shareholders are so many witnesses and sureties to depositors—to say nothing of the extensive property which the Company now holds in every part of the city. We think, therefore, that it offers full security to the public depositor, and we notice from its advertisement that it pays depositors a high interest.—Call.

FINE CLOTHING.—J. R. Mead & Co., corner of Montgomery and Bush streets, have recently received their installments of Spring styles of Custom-made Clothing, and are now prepared to dress gentlemen with that superior taste and finish for which their house is so celebrated. One trial will satisfy any man of judgment or taste that Messrs. Mead & Co. fully understand "the eternal fitness of things."

ELECTION PROCLAMATION

FOR THE Municipal Election!

In accordance with the statutes made and provided, public notice is hereby given that the Annual Municipal Election in and for the City and County of San Francisco will be held on TUESDAY, May 16, 1865; and the qualified Voters of said City and County are hereby called upon to meet in their respective Districts for the purpose of electing the following named officers at said Election, to wit:

Mayor; Sheriff; County Clerk; Recorder; Treasurer; Assessor; District Attorney; Superintendent of Common Schools; Surveyor; Harbor Master; Harbor Commissioner; Coroner, unexpired term; Coroner, full term;

One Supervisor and one School Director in each of the following Districts: 2d, 4th, 6th, 8th, 10th, 12th, for the full term. Also, one School Director in the 8th District for unexpired term; and one School Director in the 12th District for unexpired term.

One Inspector and two Judges of Election for each of the twelve Districts; also one Inspector and two Judges of Election for the Second Election Precinct of the Twelfth District. In the election of Inspectors and Judges of Election, each qualified voter shall vote for one Inspector and one Judge of Election only, and the person having the highest number of votes for Inspector, shall be declared elected Inspector, and the two persons having the highest number of votes for Judges, shall be the Judges of Election for the respective Districts. (See Laws of 1857, page 210.)

Public notice is hereby given that the several Districts, as provided in the redistricting Act, approved March 21, 1864, are bounded and described as follows, to wit:

First District—Bounded by Washington street on the south, Kearny street on the west, and the Bay of San Francisco on the north and east.

Second District—Bounded by Kearny street on the east, Vallejo street on the south, Larkin street on the west, and the Bay of San Francisco on the north.

Third District—Bounded by Washington street on the north, Kearny street on the west, California street on the south, and Market street and the Bay of San Francisco on the east.

Fourth District—Bounded by Vallejo street on the north, Kearny street on the east, Washington street on the south, and Larkin street on the west.

Fifth District—Bounded by California street on the north, Kearny street on the west, and Market street on the south and east.

Sixth District—Bounded by Kearny street on the east, Pine street on the south, Larkin street on the west, and Washington street on the north.

Seventh District—Bounded by Harrison street on the south, Second street on the west, Market street on the north, and the Bay of San Francisco on the east.

Eighth District—Bounded by Kearny street on the east, Market street on the south, Larkin street on the west, and Pine street on the north.

Ninth District—Bounded by Harrison street on the north, Seventh street on the west, and the Bay of San Francisco on the south and east.

Tenth District—Bounded by Market street on the north, Seventh street on the west, Harrison street on the south, and Second street on the east.

Eleventh District—Bounded by Seventh street on the east, by Market street and Ridgeley street in a direct line to the Pacific Ocean on the north, by the Pacific Ocean on the west, and by the line of San Mateo County and the Bay of San Francisco to the line of Seventh street on the south and east.

Twelfth District—Bounded by Larkin street on the east, by Market street and Ridgeley street in a direct line to the Pacific Ocean on the south, and by the Pacific Ocean and the Bay of San Francisco on the west and north.

"All the islands in the Bay of San Francisco, or in the Pacific Ocean within the limits of said city and county, shall, for all election purposes, be included in the First District."

Due notice will be given of the places for holding the Polls in each district.

PEOPLE'S NOMINATING COMMITTEE FOR 1865-6.

CITIZENS OF SAN FRANCISCO: In accordance with your request, the People's Committee of 1863 and 1864 have met together and chosen a Committee for 1865.

At about the close of our Conventional labors, the appalling news of the assassination of the President of the United States reached us; our address to you was prepared, but the terrible news of our loss indicated that a special meeting should be held, expression of our feelings adopted, our address changed to suit the occasion, and that our whole work might be rigidly inspected before the names of the new Committee were offered to the public. In selecting a Committee we have most thoroughly investigated and tested the loyalty of every nominee, in addition to which we have exacted from each member the following oath:

"Do you solemnly swear that you have faithfully supported the Administration since March 4th, 1861, by word, deed and action, and that you have not uttered a word, or harbored a thought, which was or could be prejudicial to the welfare of the Government of the United States, and that you voted for Abraham Lincoln and Andrew Johnson last November?"

We have aimed to select from different classes of citizens those known for their intelligence, worth and general fitness, and who from their antecedents we know have the welfare of the community at heart; who have no selfish or personal schemes in view, no friends to favor or enemies to punish. Our system of reform has been so thoroughly established that, strange as it may appear, our example is having a large and beneficial influence upon cities whose years of experience should have entitled them to homage they have failed to earn.

We trust the names we now present to the public will meet with its cordial approval, having full faith that as a Committee they will nominate none for office but those unquestionably loyal, and in all respects can claim the admiration and respect of all good citizens.

The close approach of election day is our only apology for appearing before the public at a time when every heart is full of sorrow, the city and nation stricken with grief, and when the emblems of mourning, with every word and movement, should be dedicated to an observance of the Nation's calamity.

R. G. SNEATH,

President People's Committee, 1863.

U. S. 7-30 LOAN.

BY AUTHORITY OF THE SECRETARY OF the Treasury, the undersigned has assumed the General Subscription Agency for the sale of United States Treasury Notes, bearing seven and three-tenths per cent. interest, per annum, known as the

SEVEN-THIRTY LOAN.

These Notes are issued under date of June 15th, 1865, and are payable three years from that time, in currency or are convertible, at the option of the holder, into

U. S. 5-20 SIX PER CENT.

GOLD BEARING BONDS.

These bonds are now worth a premium of nine per cent. including gold interest from November, which makes the actual profit on the 7-30 loan at current rates, including interest, about ten per cent. per annum, besides its exemption from STATE AND MUNICIPAL TAXATION, which adds FROM ONE TO THREE PER CENT. MORE, according to the rate levied on other property. The interest is payable in currency, semi-annually, by coupons attached to each note, which may be cut off and sold to any bank or banker.

The interest amounts to

One cent. per day on a $50 note.
Two cents " " $100 "
Ten " " " $500 "
20 " " " $1,000 "
$1 " " " $5,000 "

Notes of all denominations named will be promptly furnished upon receipt of subscriptions. This is now offered by the Government, and it is confidently expected that its superior advantages will make it the great

THE ONLY LOAN IN MARKET

Popular Loan of the People.

Less than $300,000,000 of the loan authorized by the last Congress, are now on the market.

This amount, at the rate of which it is being absorbed, will all be subscribed for within four months, when the notes will undoubtedly command a premium, as has uniformly been the case on closing the subscriptions to other Loans.

In order that citizens of every town and section of the country may be afforded facilities for taking the loan, the National Bank, State Banks, and Private Bankers throughout the country have generally agreed to receive subscriptions at par. Subscribers will select their own agents, in whom they have confidence, and who only are to be responsible for the delivery of the notes for which they receive orders.

ALLEN'S

LUNG BALSAM!

THE REMEDY FOR CURING

CONSUMPTION, COUGHS, COLDS,

ASTHMA, CROUP,

DISEASES OF THE THROAT, BRONCHITIS,

Pains and Oppression of the Chest or Lungs,

DIFFICULT BREATHING,

AND ALL THE

DISEASES OF THE PULMONARY ORGANS.

ITS ACTION IS EXPECTORANT, ALTERATIVE, SUDORIFIC, SEDATIVE, DIAPHORETIC and DIURETIC, which renders it one of the most valuable remedies known for curing diseases of the lungs. It excites expectoration, and causes the lungs to throw off the phlegm or mucus, changes the secretions and PURIFIES THE BLOOD; heals the irritated parts; gives strength to the digestive system, brings the liver to its proper action, and imparts, beyond the possibility of doubt, strength to the whole system. Such is the immediate and satisfactory effect, that it is warranted to break up the most distressing cough in a few hours' time, if not of too long standing. It is warranted to give entire satisfaction even in the most confirmed cases of Consumption. It is warranted not to produce costiveness, which is the case with most remedies, or affect the head, as it contains no Opium in any form. It is warranted to be perfectly harmless to the most delicate child, although it is an active and powerful remedy for restoring the system. There is no real necessity for so many deaths by Consumption, when ALLEN'S LUNG BALSAM will prevent it, if only taken in time.

OUR LATE PRESIDENT.

[The following extract is from an able article in the North American Review. It is the more valuable as a calm, dispassionate analysis of our late President's character, having been written previous to that calamity, which gave to his life a martyr's significance.]

A MAN is to be judged by the current of his life. No fair opinion can be reached by an analysis of single acts; and after a careful, serious and deliberate review of Mr. Lincoln's course during the last four years, we do not hesitate to say that there is no statesman in America to whose hands the great authority and power of the Presidency could be more fitly and confidently committed. And, in saying this, we do not disregard the fact that the affairs of the nation during the next four years will demand the highest statesmanship in the men called upon to direct them. The questions which returning peace and the re-establishment of the Government will bring up for determination will be no less perplexing than those which have attended the course of the war. To restore the State, to settle the Union upon the firm foundations of order, will be a task requiring the best wisdom. It is vain to attempt to predict the exact form in which these questions will present themselves, but upon their correct solution depends the future welfare of the nation; and they will, we may be sure, be debated with an earnestness of feeling proportioned to their importance. And it is plain that what we have been hitherto but imperfectly as a nation, we are to become quite thoroughly. America is to become more American. We have passed the period of experiment. We have met, resisted and overcome the worst perils. Prosperity and adversity have alike instructed us in the worth of our institutions, have alike confirmed our confidence in the genuine principles of democracy, and strengthened our faith in popular government.

By birth, by education, by sympathy, Mr. Lincoln is of the people. His training has been in the popular school. He is an American in the best sense; and it is a circumstance, beyond measure fortunate, that a man of this stamp should be at the head of affairs at a juncture so critical as the present, and during a period in which American principles are, as we have said, to receive new developments and wider application.

In Mr. Lincoln's position, the conflicting interests and the contradictory opinions of men of the loyal, and especially of the border States, have made it a task of extreme difficulty and delicacy to learn the true sentiment of the North. To unite and to keep united the people of the loyal States in the support of the administration, so far as such union was possible, was Mr. Lincoln's arduous task. On this union depended the power to carry on the war. Every delay, every disaster to our arms, every incompetence, every personal disappointment and private grief, every wounded vanity, all partisan hates and jealousies, every danger, in fine, against which an American statesman could be called on to provide, lay in his path. He could not, if he did his duty, expect either wholly to please his friends or to win his enemies; he could not force compliance with his views, or insist on the adoption of measures which he might deem desirable or essential. His character was not fitted to secure a strong body of personal supporters. He stood comparatively isolated and alone; and his duty was to save the Union, and to save it with its institutions sound and whole. Popular opinion was changing and developing rapidly. Mr. Lincoln's own views were changing and advancing with it. But it was impossible to make sure of popular opinion, so diverse were the voices of the people. "I am approached," said Mr. Lincoln, "with the most opposite opinions and advice, and that by religious men, who are equally certain that they represent the Divine will. I am sure," he added with humorous irony, "that either one or the other class is mistaken in that belief, and perhaps, in some respects, both are." The elements in the problem given him to solve were of the most complex and difficult character. He might well be pardoned if, doing his best, he had failed. Sagacious, beyond most men, in his estimate of popular opinion he has the intuition of a genuine statesman as to the manner and moment of its use. He has not fallen into the common error of politicians, of mistaking a gust of enthusiasm or of passion for the steady wind of conviction, or of fancying a thundersquall of violence to be a black storm of gathered discontent. He has not sought to control events, but he has known how to turn events—among the most important of which are to be reckoned the moods of a great people in time of trial—to the benefit of the cause of the nation and of mankind.

The mania for inviting artists to suppers and parties in order to have them perform on the piano for the amusement of the invited guests, reminds us of an anecdote about Chopin. This celebrated composer was invited by the Comtesse d'Agoutt to supper, and after supper was invited to play. He sat down at the piano, touched the instrument for about two minutes, and then got up. "O, Monsieur Chopin," said the Comtesse, "you have played only so little!" "But Madame," replied Chopin, "I have only eaten so little!"

A female descendant of the great Marshal Turenne (the renowned French general,) has just been sentenced to imprisonment, for theft, at the petty sessions of the Seine.

NAPOLEON'S "JULIUS CÆSAR."

[The following extracts from The History of Julius Cæsar, by Louis Napoleon, will be examined with interest, as indicative of the degree of ability which characterizes the work:]

SULLA'S DICTATORSHIP.

THE history of the last fifty years, and especially the Dictatorship of Sulla, evidently showed that Italy required a master. On all sides the institutions gave way before the power of one who was sustained not only by his own partisans, but also by the warlike crowd who, tired out by the action and the reaction of so many opposite parties, longed for order and repose. Had the conduct of Sulla been moderate, that which is called the Empire would probably have begun with him; but his authority was exercised with such cruelty and one-sidedness, that on his death people forgot the abuses of liberty, to think only of the abuses of tyranny. The more the democratic spirit spread, the more did the old institutions lose the prestige that once attached to them. In truth, as democracy, confiding and impassioned, always believes its interests to be more suitably represented by a single person than by a political body, it was ever inclined to intrust its future to him who should raise himself by merit above his contemporaries. The Gracchi, Marius and Sulla had each in turn disposed at their pleasure of the destinies of the Republic; had with impunity trampled under foot old institutions and old usages; but their reign was transient, for they represented only factions. Instead of comprehensive regard for the wishes and interests of the whole Italian peninsula, they favored this or that class of society exclusively. Some wanted, above all other things, to improve the condition of the pauper population of Rome, to procure emancipation for the Italiotes, or preponderance for the Equestrian order; while others sought to maintain the privileges of the aristocracy. Both failed. In order to found a durable order of things a man was wanting who, raising himself above vulgar passions, should combine in himself the essential qualities and the just ideas of each one of those who had preceded him, and who should avoid their defects as well as their errors. To the greatness of soul and the love for the people which distinguished certain of the Tribunes, he should join the military genius of the great Generals, and the profound attachment of the Dictator to order and hierarchy. The man qualified for so high a commission already existed, but, notwithstanding his name, he would perhaps have remained long unknown had not the penetrating eye of Sulla detected him amid the crowd, and by persecution drew the attention of the people upon him. That man was Cæsar.

DESCRIPTION OF CÆSAR.

* * * To these natural gifts, developed by a brilliant education, were joined physical advantages. His lofty stature and his finely-moulded and well proportioned limbs, imparted to his person a grace which distinguished him from all others. His eye was dark, his glance penetrating, his complexion colorless, his nose straight and somewhat thick. His mouth was small and regular, and the lips, rather full, gave to the lower part of his face an expression of kindliness, while his breadth of forehead indicated the development of the intellectual faculties. His face was full, at least, in his youth; but in the busts which were made towards the close of his life, his features are thinner, and bear the traces of fatigue. His voice was sonorous and vibrating: his gesture noble, and an air of dignity pervaded his whole person. His constitution, which at first was delicate, grew robust by sober living, and by his habit of exposing himself to the inclemency of the seasons. Accustomed from his youth to manly exercise he was a bold horseman; and he supported with ease privations and fatigue. Habitually abstemious, his health was not weakened by excess of labor, nor by excess of pleasure. Nevertheless, on two occasions, once at Cordova and then at Thapsus, he had a nervous attack, which was erroneously thought to be epilepsy. He paid particular attention to his person, shaved with care, or had the hairs plucked out; he brought forward artistically his hair to the front of his head, and this in his more advanced age served to conceal his baldness. He was reproached with the affectation of scratching his head with only one finger for fear of deranging his hair. His dress was arranged with exquisite taste. His gown was generally bordered with the laticlavi ornamented with fringes to the hands, and was bound round the loins by a sash loosely knotted—a fashion which distinguished the elegant and effeminate youth of the period. But Sulla was not deceived by this show of frivolity, and he was wont to recommend that people should have an eye on that young man with the flowing sash. He had a taste for pictures, statues, and gems; and he always wore on his finger, in memory of his origin, a ring on which was engraved the figure of an armed Venus. To sum up, there were found in Cæsar, physically and morally, two natures which are rarely combined in the same person. He joined aristocratic fastidiousness of person to the vigorous temperament of the soldier; the graces of mind to the profundity of thought; the love of luxury and of the arts to a passion for military life in all its simplicity and rudeness. In a word, he joined the elegance of manner which seduces to the energy of character which commands. Such was Cæsar at the age of 18, when Sulla possessed himself of the Dictatorship. He had already attracted the attention of the Romans by his name, his wit, his engaging manners, which were so pleasing to men, and still more so, perhaps, to women.

PERIODS OF TRANSITION.

In periods of transition—and this is their greatest danger—when it is necessary to choose between a glorious past and an unknown future, bold and unscrupulous men are those only who thrust themselves forward. Others, more timid and enslaved by prejudices, remain in the shade, and are an obstacle to the movement by which society is borne on to new ways. It is always a great evil for a country which has been a prey to agitation that honest men, or good men, as Cicero called them, do not accept the modern ideas which by moderating they might direct. Hence profound divisions. On the one hand, disreputable people profit by the good or evil passions of the crowd; on the other, honorable, but passive or intractable men, oppose all progress, and provoke, by their obstinate resistance, legitimate impatience and deplorable violence. The opposition of these last mentioned has the double disadvantage of leaving the field clear to those less worthy, and of keeping up doubt in the minds of the floating mass who judge of parties more by the probity of individuals than by the value of ideas. What passed in those times at Rome is a striking example of the fact. Was it not, indeed, just that people should hesitate to prefer to the faction which had its head illustrious persons like Hortensius, Catullus, Marcellus, Lucullus and Cato the party which counted in its ranks men like Catinus, Manlius, Catiline, Vatinius and Clodius? What more legitimate in the eyes of the descendants of the ancient families than that resistance to all change, and the disposition to consider all reform as utopian, and almost sacrilegious? What more logical than to admire the firmness and soul of Cato, who, still young, braved the threat of death rather than admit the possibility of becoming one day the defender of the cause of the allies demanding the rights of Roman citizens? And how should they not enter into the feelings of Catullus and Hortensius defending with obstinacy the privileges of the aristocracy, and manifesting their fears at the onward impulse to concentrate all authority in a single person?

And yet the cause supported by such men was doomed to perish, like everything else that has completed its time. In spite of their virtues, they were only an obstacle the more in the regular march of civilization, because they were deficient in the quality which is most essential in times of revolution—the faculty of understanding the requirements of the moment and the problems of the future. Instead of seeking out what could be saved from the wreck of the old régime, which was going to pieces on that most formidable of rocks—corruption of public morals—they refused to admit that the institutions to which the Republic had been indebted for its greatness would prove the cause of its decline. Terrified at every innovation, they confounded in the same proscription the sedition of a few Tribunes and the just demands of the people. But their influence was so considerable, and the ideas that were hallowed by them held such an empire over their minds, that they would still have obstructed the triumph of the popular cause, had not Cæsar, by putting himself at its head, given it new lustre and irresistible force. A party, like an army, cannot conquer but under a leader worthy to command it, and all who, since the time of the Gracchi, had raised the flag of reform had sullied it with blood and degraded it with revolt. Cæsar raised it up again and purified it. In order to constitute his party he had, it is true, sometimes recourse to agents far from estimable. The best architect can only build with the materials he has at hand; but his constant thought was to associate in his designs the most respectable men. He spared no effort to gain over Pompey, Crassus, Cicero, Servilius, Scipio, Q. Fuscus Cælenus, S. Sulpicius, and many others of the same stamp. In moments of transition, when the old system is in extremity and the new one not yet in place, the greatest difficulty does not consist in overcoming obstacles which are opposed to the installation of a Government called for by the wishes of the country, but in solidly establishing it: in founding it on the co-operation of honorable men penetrated with the new ideas, and firm in their principles.

WARMER THAN OUR ANCESTORS!—In a communication, made to the British Meteorological Society, Mr. Glashier stated, as a result of an elaborate inquiry, that the climate, during the last hundred years, had altered—that, in fact, the temperature of the year is two degrees warmer now than then: the temperature of the month of January has increased still more, and the winter months are all much warmer.

THERE were two soldiers once, in Grant's army, lying beneath their blankets, looking up at the stars in a Virginian sky. Says Jack: "What made you go into the army, Tom?" "Well," replied Tom, "I had no wife, and I love war. What made you go to the war, Jack?" "Well," he replied, "I had a wife, and I love peace, so I went to the war."

ALAMEDA PARK HOTEL.

This new and elegant House will be opened for the reception of guests, on SATURDAY, the 18th instant. It is situated on the Alameda Encinal, within three minutes' walk of the San Leandro Railway, and three miles from the end of the wharf, between which and the foot of Broadway, steamers ply at frequent intervals during the day. The hotel can be reached by boat and rail, in forty minutes from Montgomery street. The location is in the midst of a dense grove, and, as a suburban resort, cannot be surpassed for beauty and healthfulness. This hotel is splendidly fitted up with all the modern improvements, and in every respect will be conducted as a first class public house.

The proprietor would call especial attention of families to the attractiveness of this locality, so accessible, and yet retired, and free from the turmoil of the city.

Bowling Alleys, Billiard rooms, and all of the leading journals of the day will be at the disposal of visitors, while the sportsman can find an abundance of wild game in the vicinity of the hotel.

By a strict attention to business the proprietor hopes to merit the public patronage.

BRANDRETH'S PILLS!THE SAFE PATH TO HEALTH!*PURIFY THE BLOOD!

The value of Brandreth's Pills, in a climate like ours is hardly to be estimated. Their prompt use every day saves valuable lives. Always keep them in the house.
In cholera and in sudden pains of all kinds they soon give relief, and the patient is restored with renewed health.

BRANDRETH'S PILLS!

For one hundred and thirteen years, have held their reputation for efficacy, mildness and absolute certainty of operation; in fact, they are admitted to be the BEST PURGATIVE by all who have used them.

THEY ARE UNRIVALLED AS A FAMILY MEDICINE,

In Dyspepsia, Loss of Appetite, Habitual Costiveness, Rheumatic Pains in the Head, in Affections of the Kidneys, in the Diseases of Childhood, and for Worms, and as a General Purifier of the Blood. For Colds, Bilious Affections, Fevers and Disorders arising from Obstructed Perspiration, so common in this climate, they have not their equals among all the Medicines of the Day.

AS A PURGATIVE AND BILIOUS PILL,

They have not their equal in the world. Employed according to directions, accompanying every box of new style, they produce

Having removed from 617 Clay street

To 129 MONTGOMERY STREET, SAN FRANCISCO
ARE NOW MANUFACTURING THE NEW style of ARTIFICIAL TEETH so highly approved at the East, and which to be appreciated only requires to be seen. The Teeth, Gums and Plate are made of one entire piece of Porcelain without seam or joint, combining great strength and beauty with absolute purity and freedom from any metallic taste, while the coloring of the gums and the interior of the month are so perfect as to almost defy detection. All interested in the progress of the Arts are invited to examine samples of this work.
Superior Gold and Vulcanite Work also manufactured as usual, but at greatly reduced price. ju18

He will not make elaborate pretensions to any mysterious claims made by many in the profession, but flatters himself that a constant and extensive practice of nineteen years, with due attention to all improvements extant, will capacitate him to compete with any in the profession. Teeth set in any style, or on any base desired—Gold, Platina, Silver, or Vulcanite, now much in vogue. Teeth plugged substantially with all popular materials. Teeth extracted with or without anesthetic agencies. All professional services—Medical, Surgical or Mechanical—insured to give satisfaction, or no charge.

THE WILLOWS!

The HOTEL of this popular and fashionable place of public resort was opened to the public on SUNDAY, the 24 of April, 1865; also the grounds were thrown open to those who wish to spend a few hours of recreation and pleasure; also the Lodging Apartments, Restaurants, and Ladies' Refreshment Saloon, will be in readiness for occupancy.

The Shooting Gallery, Ten-Pin Alleys, and Shuffle Board have been replaced, and are now ready for public patronage, as well as the Flying Horses for Children, which are now in readiness to perform daily duty.

Ample Stabling is attached to the premises, attended by polite and watchful grooms.

The THEATRE has been newly decorated, and rendered more comfortable for public use, in which there will be a grand Instrumental Concert every Sunday Afternoon to be followed by a GRAND BALL.

The Grounds are thrown open to Military Companies, as well as for Schools, for Picnics, Military Parades, etc.

The Restaurant and Refreshment Saloons will be under the charge of WIMMER, the celebrated Caterer.

The Bars will be stocked with all the best brands of LIQUORS AND WINES, and nothing will be left undone to make the WILLOWS the grandest place of resort on the Pacific Coast. The Proprietors hope, by reason of experience and strict attention to the comforts of their guests, to secure a share of the patronage of the public.

North Beach and Mission Railroad Company Cars leave the corner of Montgomery and California streets every eight minutes for the Willows.

Programmes and Posters will be distributed throughout the city for Saturday and Sunday Performances.

DR. WISTAR'S BALSAM

WILD CHERRY,

HAS BEEN USED FOR

NEARLY HALF A CENTURY,

With the most astonishing success in curing

Coughs, Colds, Hoarseness, Sore Throat, Influenza, Whooping Cough, Croup, Liver Complaint, Bronchitis, Difficulty of Breathing, Asthma, and every Affection of

The Throat, Lungs and Chest,

INCLUDING EVEN

CONSUMPTION.

There is scarcely one individual in the community who wholly escapes, during a season, from some one, however slightly developed, of the above symptoms—a neglect of which might lead to the last-named and most to be dreaded disease in the whole catalogue. The power of the "medicinal gum" of the Wild Cherry Tree over this class of complaint is well known; so great is the good it has performed, and so great the popularity it has acquired.

In this preparation, besides the virtues of the Cherry, there are commingled with it other ingredients of like value, thus increasing its value tenfold, and forming a Remedy whose power to soothe, to heal, to relieve, and to cure disease, exists in no other medicine yet discovered.

The unequalled success that has attended the application of this medicine in all cases of

has induced many physicians of high standing to employ it in their practice, some of whom advise us of the fact under their own signatures. We have space only for the names of a few of these:

S. H. Finley, M. D., San Francisco, Cal.
E. Boyden, M. D., Exeter, Me.
Alexander Hutch, M. D., China, Mo.
R. Fellows, M. D., Hill, N. H.
W. H. Webb, M. D., Cape Vincent, N. Y.
W. B. Lynch, M. D., Auburn, N. Y.
Abraham Skillman, M. D., Boundbrook, N. J.
H. D. Martin, M. D., Mansfield, Pa.

The proprietors have letters from all classes of our fellow-citizens, from the Halls of Congress to the humblest cottage, and even from beyond the seas; for the fame and virtues of WISTAR'S BALSAM have extended to the "utmost bounds of the earth," without any attempt on our part to introduce it beyond the limits of our own country.

TO CALIFORNIANS AND OREGONIANS.

HAMLET—Act III., Scene 2.

MR. GLAISHER stated, in a recent communication to the British Meteorological Society, that he had discovered by long and patient research that the climate had, during the last hundred years, undergone a great change—that the temperature is now two degrees warmer than it was then. It would be strange indeed if this were not the case. It is generally admitted that the final destruction of this world will be effected by fire. As the core of fire burns away the substance of the earth, approaching nearer to the outer rind, it of course affects the climate. Each year will the climate grow warmer. The earth is being gradually prepared for destruction. That there is great store of inflammable material boarded up in its bowels is sufficiently evinced by the recent discoveries of coal oil. This world is admirably arranged for burning. When the Great Day comes, then will the internal fires be set loose from the caverns of the earth; they will rush forth greedily lapping the rivers of petroleum that will flow from every pore—that is, bore. The masses of snow which cap the mountains will melt and serve as fuel to the flame. Then will Apollo and Diana, (the sun and moon,) the hunter and huntress, descend upon the tortured earth as it writhes in expiring throes, "and the earth shall be chased like a roe." With lightning speed will our earth, changed into a comet, its huge tail of flame streaming forth from its disrupt interior, dart through infinite space. The climate is getting warmer! Strange, is it not? Every shaft sunk into the howels of the earth tends to make the climate warmer; every tunnel brings the world nearer to its final end. Man is destroying this beautiful world. Let him exult in the progress of Art and Science—they are the fiery steeds on which the earth is rushing to ruin; each new discovery is another engine of destruction let loose from Pandora's box. A ruined world preparing for destruction! Reflect on it, ye philosophers, who think that ye are wise when ye discover that it is warmer now than it used to be! Steadily is the store of fire enclosed in the centre of the earth pushing its way outwards through cracks and fissures towards the surface. "And there shall be earthquakes in divers places." As the fire pushes its way outwards, the earth, yielding to its pressure, will be rent, and what we call an earthquake be produced. "And there shall be wars and rumors of wars." The climate is getting warmer and men's passions are inflamed with the fire which warms the climate. As the earth approaches her final destruction her children—the parasites called men, which infest her surface—sympathizing with their common mother, will be seized with a desire to destroy. They will cease to value this earth as a beautiful spot; a dreadful premonition of its approaching fate will render them reckless. What matters it, when the sun and the moon shall descend from heaven, whether the population of the earth be many or few? What value will be set on life in those last days, when the hunters shall chase the poor torn earth like a roe through endless space? Well, well; it will be a long time before this happens—three, perhaps four hundred years. Let us build more railroads, make more wonderful discoveries, grope deep in the bowels of mother earth and tear them for the rich gold and silver which they contain—baits set to tempt us to rend her and make easy the final breaking up of her form. Yes, Mr. Glaisher, you are right—the climate is getting warmer, and will continue to do so. Summer will be long chase old Winter from the earth, and he will fly to some other planet which has not yet advanced so far in its preparations for being burned. The climate is decidedly warmer!

THE Prince of Wales went to Chertsey Steeple Chases, and while walking about, accompanied by his brother officers of the Guards, had his pocket picked of his watch. These Guards are evidently not watch guards. The police have not been able to discover the thief, but say that they have ascertained that, whoever he may be, he has already styled himself "Pickpocket to H. R. H., the Prince of Wales." The Prince is very much grieved at the loss of his watch, it having been a present from his mamma. The Guards ought really to take better care of Albert and see that he does not get his pocket picked by black guards. "The divinity that doth hedge a king" does not appear to guard a prince's pockets while he is "hedging" on the result of a steeple chase. The prince, when next his brother officers say, "Come now toward Chertsey," will be apt to leave a watch at home, or if he does pocket his watch will watch his pocket, lest some thief, ambitious to become a repeater of his "pal's" achievement, should make another descent on the prince's pocket and pick it in the midst of his Guards.

AMONG the books given as prizes to the scholars of the Denman Grammar School were three copies of Bunyan's Pilgrim's Progress. That is all right; Bunyan's Pilgrim's Progress is a nice Sunday book; but at the very top of the list published in the papers we notice Byron's Poetical Works as having been given to a young lady. Surely this cannot be the poetical works of the Byron who wrote that shockingly improper poem called "Don Juan"! We cannot believe that the Directors of the Denman Grammar School would give such a naughty book to one of the pupils. Perhaps he never read "Don Juan." If he never did, we can assure him that it is a very shocking poem, and the best thing he can do is to make that little girl give him back Byron's Poetical Works and let him give her a Bunyan's Pilgrim's Progress instead.

THE Alta is truly most unfortunate in its attempts to serve its friends. It has such a very confused notion of the meaning of the majority of words in the English language that it, in nine cases out of ten, misapplies them in such a manner as to convey an idea directly opposite to that which it would, did it know what words it ought to enunciate. On Thursday it tried to say a good word for Mr. Nathan Porter, and succeeded in leading people to believe that he denied the divinity of Christ! The Alta's abuse can hurt no one, but its praise is terribly fatal to its object. If it wishes to praise a low comedian it will call him "dignified," while it will commend a tragedian for being fat and jolly-looking! Damning with faint praise is not an easy operation, but damning with Alta praise is deadly sure to be effectual. The Alta is like an affectionate but clumsy old cat who, in her attempts to fondle and cherish her kittens, rolls over on the poor little things and smothers them to death.

PEOPLE are very fond of abusing the Alta; they say it is dull and stupid, and that if it were not for the telegraphic despatches it would positively contain nothing worth reading. This is ungrateful. The Alta pays out large sums that it may present its readers with interesting news from all parts of the world, and if it is dull and stupid it is perfectly unobjectionable; it is not filled with bad language which no lady can read without a blush. One occasionally sees very interesting little items of news in the Alta. For instance, on Wednesday, after reading the telegraphic news, we looked carefully through its columns to see if there were anything else to read, and found the following:

"A terrier slut in Dayton, Nevada, has taken two kittens to nurse."

THE Call has a hit at the musical critic whom the Alta has, regardless of expense, hired, for this occasion only, to do up its criticisms during the opera season. It asks "What is 'floric execution' in music? Has it anything to do with flowers, or do flowers discourse music?" The Call thinks this is a floorer! Bah! It was only a flower of speech. Doesn't Shakespeare make the "Duke" in Twelfth Night say:

"That strain again—it had a dying fall:
O, it came o'er my ear like the sweet south,
That breathes upon a bank of violets,"

No doubt that idea was suggested by the "floric execution" of the musicians who played the strain. As to the last portion of the query, don't roses discourse music when they are blowing? Isn't Henry Bush's "Harp of the Day" the same sort of thing as a dabbler—or a day lyre?

R. D. Francis, correspondent of the New York Times, is writing letters to that paper telling people how shockingly bad the rations which the rebels gave Union prisoners confined in Libby Prison were, and what good rations the rebel prisoners who are now confined there receive from us. What on earth does it signify now, all the Union prisoners are freed? Each Union man was glad to receive his liberation and each rebel prisoner is satisfied with his Libby ration.

THE election is close upon us. The politicians are blowing like porpoises, spouting like whales. There are some queer fish among them. Before election day we shall have full biographies of all the candidates for position; interesting particulars about Jones' owing his washerwomen four bits for three weeks, how Tibbs was seen shaking hands with a "Copperhead" as they came out of church together, etc. etc. San Francisco is blessed with one paper at least that is not afraid to tell the truth—or anything else that suits its purpose, for that matter—and we may look for most interesting developments. Much dirt will be thrown, and by patient persistence some of it will at length be made to stick.

"Join us," cried th' unfettered flashes,
To the lightning tamed by man,
"Speak not, save in thunder crashes;
Leap forth from this paltry span!"
"Ah," replied the laboring lightning
"See, man has me wired down;
I who once flashed, mortals fright'ning,
Tamed, take news from town to town."
Angry gleam the lightning's flashes—
Fiercely on the wires, see,
Heaven's unfettered lightning dashes—
Joyful, sets man's captive free!

IN Oregon, Beale and Baker, arrested for the murder of an old man of the name of Delaney, have confessed their crime, but, says the Bulletin's correspondent, "attempt to gloss it over by a statement that their real purpose was only robbery, and that the old man was shot by reason of Baker misunderstanding Beale, who cried out to him 'not to shoot,' which the former understood and acted upon without the 'not.' They will probably both be allowed the benefit of a (k) not."

"A THOUSAND demons lurk within the lee," nothing but the dregs of the Young Rebellion remain. Columbia has bravely drained the cup of bitterness offered to her lips, to the last drop—when she reached the lee, her task was done.

THE Alta advertises that it is prepared to do election printing, and among other little electioneering tools, mentions "gummed names, on superior paper made expressly for us." Is it possible that the Alta intends to play the gum game on the opposition party!

A PARAGRAPH is going the rounds of the press to the effect that Charles Goodyear devoted thirty years to the invention of India rubber. Did he really? And yet, after the invention was perfected, it was only one Good year's work.

A MOTHER'S SONG TO HER INFANT.

DOVE of promise from life's portal,
Baby-bird upon my breast,
Flower of love from source immortal,
Sleep, my darling, sleep and rest.

Life from life your lips are seeking,
Drink its currents, hush your sighs,
There in joy its tides are beating—
From my heart its springs arise.

Love from out his ark hath sent thee,
Seeking life and seeking peace;
Fold thy wings, dove, stop and rest thee,—
On my bosom troubles cease.

Wanderer from the lands celestial,
Floating on Time's boundless sea,
Pilgrim now on land terrestrial,
Make thy home and rest with me.

A RIDE THROUGH THE RAISIN COUNTRY.

IT was three o'clock of an August morning, and the soft deep blue darkness of the Andalusian firmament was punctuated with golden and diamond stars that seemed to wink at me as, half-sleepily, I tugged to my earpet-bag, eventually, after a hard struggle, got the better of it and looked it with a chirping click of triumph. I descended the silent stone stairs of the Fonda Europa, thinking of Gil Blas's seampish but amusing night adventures, fell over two pails, one pair of boots and a tin dust-pan, and debouched by a side door into the now silent diligence office, where the shuffle and pawing of hoofs indicated the presence of horses.

But I must go back, or I shall never get on with the story of my wonderful ride through that enchanted Moorish country. My ride came to me thus: I and Major Hodgins, of the Mounted Bombardiers, at present stationed at the Rock (as subs, with half-fretful love, call Gibraltar, when they do not contract it to Gib,) had come to Malaga from Bailen, the scene of the only real victory over the French the Spanish ever gained in the late Peninsular War. Tired of the City of Raisins, we determined to push on at once, hot and fast, for Granada, the city of the Moorish palace. Before we had well got down our muscatel-grapes and white bread, we hurried to the diligence office, invited by a red-lettered board inscribed with the names of a dozen or two cities. A severe old Don looked at us over his steel spectacles, and referred to endless books, muttering. It was of no use; people were hurrying back from bathing and the bull-fight, from Malaga to Granada. There were no seats for fifteen days. Imagine no conveyance, or rather, no places vacant, from London to Derby for fifteen days! My blood rose to two hundred and fifty in the shade, and I am afraid the Don grew offended at our impatience closed his books, nibbed his pen, and refusing to answer any further applications, began piling up a Nelson column of figures and then running up red lines with his pen as if he were climbing a ladder. In vain we clung to the mahogany rails of his desk, and, through the bars, put imaginary cases of possible misfortunes attendant on fifteen days' delay. Don Fulano was both deaf and dumb. In vain we talked about the Swiss system of Supplements, which were put on the road as postscripts for residue travellers who could not be accommodated by the regular diligence. In vain we enlisted allies in the shape of a valuable negro boots in a yellow jacket, who, with a shoe in one hand and a brush in the other, addressed entreaties to Don Fulano worthy of Cicero in his best days. In vain he was joined by a friendly one-eyed touter in a rusty black-eraped hat, who threw himself into pathetic attitudes worthy of the old judicial Roman mimics who did the gestures while Cato did the speaking. All they did was to drive the Don almost to personal violence. The black Cicero and the Cyclops touter fled before his uplifted ruler. After some quieter diplomacy, however, and the shovel-boarding of a stray half-dollar, Don Fulano grew more civil. Don Denaro had done what neither Cicero nor Demosthenes could do.

Joy, joy in Avelon! Don Fulano erases the name of an old woman, who can safely be defied, and whose fifteen days are of no importance, and inserts —? "Whose name, Senor?" Hodgins and I looked at each other. We agree to toss up. Don Fulano puts his pen behind his ear, and huddles up to the rails to see the "sortes;" the old divination by lot. Up goes the dollar in a silvery summersault.

"Heads or tails? Man or woman?"

"Woman," I cry.

It comes the Queen of Spain, and I win.

Hodgins, before convivial and noisy, looked blank. I drew him into the little den of my friend the negro boots. I proposed to him that he should hire two horses and a guide, and ride over the spur of the Sierra Nevada, by way of Velez, Malaga and Alhama (Byron's Alhama,) to Granada—fair-land, sugar-canes, oleanders, Arabian nights, etc.

"And perhaps get murdered?" said Hodgins, taking to his cigar-case. "I don't seem to see it. Riding, when off duty, is a bore."

"My dear fellow," said I, with a quiet diplomatic smile, "I only said this to try you. I will be knight errant, and ride over the mountain, as you will not let me over-ride your objections. I start to-morrow morning at three: you at twelve to-night. You will be fourteen hours going, I two days; but never mind—

Come what, come may,
Time and tide wear out the roughest day."

"Delightful plan," said Hodgins, gaining heart. "Bravo! I admire your pluck: I have a great mind to go with you. Good-by. I'll go and order a cold fowl and a melon, to take with me for the night, for I shan't sleep a wink."

Hodgins was a lady's man, and a polite man, but self-denial was a virtue he had not learnt. If I had been murdered in the mountains, he would have said: "Bless my soul! Poor devil! I thought he was doing a foolish thing. I am sorry I cannot stop for his funeral; I must be back, you know, at Gib; my leave expires!"

My preparations were soon made. I filled my flask with Amontillado, and ordered some bisenits. El Moro, the guide, was to knock at my door at half-past two. Till then—it was now six—what to do? I read Ford and Dou Quixote for half an hour; then got out on the balcony, and listened to the military band performing a dirge in the Alameda for some Dou Donothing; watched the ladies with the fluttering fans, the priests and soldiers. Then as it got darker, I sat on my chair and marked the houses opposite—so open and transparent—each window a little domestic picture. That shop at the bottom, with the luminous red curtain before the door, is the barber's: a little toy-brass basin dangles over the threshold. The barber is a Madrid man, for I can hear him lisp his th's as the Northern Spaniards do, calling it Castilian; much to the contempt of Andalusians. That sort of stable-door next to it with an iron grating over the top, (there being no visible window at all,) is the entrance to a billiard-room; for, now that the lumps are lit up and down the street of the King's Fountain, I can see the luminous golden green cloth and the ivory balls running about, knocking their heads together. There is a great hum of voices in the street; but no fierce defiant whistling nor rebellious street cries, impudent and insulting. That place opposite, with the wide open doorway, is the diligence office, the boards at the door-posts are painted with red letters on white ground, and remind me of the diamonds in a pack of cards. Those quiet, elatty burgeses seated on chairs at the door, are people waiting to go by the Madrid diligence at eight o'clock. Part of them are El Tato's quadrille (gang) of bull-fighters, going back to Madrid. They would be pleasant company, and full of stories of gladiator during, such as short-sighted Nero would have rejoiced to see through the emerald spy-glass we are told he used. I ring the bell, order up some preserved peaches in syrup, pour out a deep draught of wine and water, and amuse myself by listening to the new sounds, and determine to save up my system for the next day's fourteen hours in the saddle, slip under the pink mosquito curtains and try to sleep; though the hour is supernaturally early. First one side then the other; the curtains make it close and hot, and there is a hum in the street; but I dare not shut the glass windows, for there is no chimney in the room. I determine to sleep. I elench my eyes, and think fixedly of nothing. I try all the old tricks, count till I outrival Cocker, Bidder, Babbage and De Morgan. I try to wear myself out with staring at a veil of darkness. I fancy smoke rising from my knees in a blue, wavy column. I know that, when I get my mind to the focus in a single thought, unbroken and entire, that one thought will be sleep. But all these mental efforts rouse me to quite a creative state of wakefulness. Now, at last, I am getting into a fancy of sinking on my back through miles of sea, in search of the flaw in the Atlantic telegraph, when the door bursts open, and Hodgins enters.

"Farewell, old boy! I admire your pluck. You'll have a delicious ride. They're putting the horses to. Good-by, God bless you; we shall meet again at Phillipi." He was gone. I heard the old diligence ten minutes after, roll, toss and jumble off on its fourteen hour course.

I fell asleep, and when a sharp hurrying knock of El Moro woke me, I did as I have before told you.

"Full purse and full stomach never tire," said El Moro, a dry thin old young man, in a grey jacket.

"A merry heart goes all the day," said I, capping him from the divine Williams.

I had taken the greatest possible precaution the day before to get the best horse in the landlord's stable, knowing that a long and even dangerous ride lay before me. I had gone into the dark shrine of Jupiter Amunonia, all but arm in arm with the negro Boots in the yellow jacket before-named and had had my pick of the row of sullen-eyed, lank steeds that pulled at their chains as I passed behind their rows of heels. I rejected the special horses pointed me out by the Boots, and fixed on a good-natured, robust black cob, sound of wind and limb, and able, I was sure, from his sinewy flank, to bear much fatigue. I chose him in a solemn way; and El Moro, the guide, approved likewise.

He quite agreed to it; yet now, when I get out of the shadow of the houses into the clear starlight, that seems all in a glow-worm flutter and twitter at the first chill of dawn, will you believe it? I find myself hoaxed into a vile, flea-bitten gray, with a hiccupping stumble that seizes him at regular intervals of four minutes. I am, however, afraid of disturbing the temper of El Moro, as I am at his mercy for nearly two days; so I pocket the insult and go hiccupping on. If I hint at Hiccup's infirmity, stolid El Moro asserts he is muy fuerte (very strong,) a horse of fortitude that never tires; then quotes the proverb, "He who goes on, gets there," and, tying his saddle-bags pinehingly tighter, remarks that "fast bind is fast find," or, as he rhymes it, "Quien bien ata, bien desata." There is something Quixotic in El Moro as he elinks over the trottoir erect and lean in his gray jacket, his neat shoes with rusty spurs in them, a good apple-twig for a switch, and my red and green umbrella, fastened at his pummel above his own cloth jacket, which he keeps for the cold mountains, when we shall get near the all but perpetual snow patches of the Sierra. There is a determined gravity and caution, as of a Hadji or Bedouin guide, in his air. His black turban cap is tied on by a string fastening under his beardless chin. If I stop a moment behind, he turns to look after me. He is as faithful, dull a Sancho as English traveller ever had.

It is very quiet in the streets: the lamps burn dim like yellow flowers with glow-worms inside them; the trot and clatter, and dust of our horses' hoofs, sound quite startling in the hush of the night. The drowsy sentinels in their brown coats, try to look vigilant and suspicious when they see us. We clink along the dusty Alameda with the faded acacias and deserted seats—pass hundreds of grated windows and closed shops—chink and seuffle alternately past merchants' houses and over public walks, and come out at last by the broad quay to the sea-shore; where the be-plumed waves, a little white and angry about the lips, seem complaining, and asking where the men are gone who, all day, sift maize into heaps, crush raisins into tubs, and roll melons in and out of ships; where the little terra-cotta images of boys that, all day, dive and splash off these brown rock-slabs—where the striped awn-figed boats and the bare-footed fishermen?

Our pace is not fast, because the horses have got fourteen hours of it before them. We amble under the castle whose low lines of wall look much as when Blake threatened it. We look down from the dusty hill that commands the town. The white column of the light-house by the Quarantine harbor, where the deadly yellow flag flies, is to the right, reminding me, though I can hardly believe, that it is the same place that I spent an hour at this morning, down at the jetty-head, watching the blue waves race up to kiss and tease the land; when the distant hills looked like brown velvet and solid amethyst, as they were either far or near. Then there was that great American steamer there, with one great red port-hole open, as if it had received a gory stab which would not heal—now all mystery and dimness that clears, however, every moment. One mule, laden with grass-net panniers of charepal, is all that passes us till we get past the first poor suburb cottages and out into the broad sea-shore road, which is a foot deep in thick lava dust.

Then rises a great whirl of dust in the distance, answering to that which clouds from our eight hoofs, and suddenly a string of donkeys bear down upon us by twos and threes, and in clumps of eight and ten. Now our trouble begins; for they raise a dust so thick that the distant ones become quite invisible, and it is difficult to avoid them but for the monotonous clip-clap, ding-dong bell, that the leader-donkey wears consequentially round his neck. These are donkeys from the vineyards round Velez Malaga, bringing the Christmas raisins of England for shipment at Malaga, where the holds of dozens of vessels gape and ery for them, that the ships may depart and be early at the Mining Lane market. Every donkey carries twelve small, square deal boxes; six on each side of his panniers, which rest on a padded pack-saddle. Every donkey has a head-stall or fillet, or shaving-brush of red, with plaited ornaments or eruppers of red and rhubarb yellow, that give them an oriental and novel look. Let the donkey be of a silvery-grey or brown, and scrubby as an old hair portmanteau that has been rubbed into sore patches, still there was always the pink shaving-brush on the forehead, the smart neck-trapping, or the black and yellow crupper.

As for the drivers—for there were generally two and a boy to each half-dozen donkeys—they were not all Andalusians, with linen jackets and black round caps; but many of them were Valencians and Asturians, wearing the loose white linen drawers and plaids of their province—wild, elf-haired, hard brown men, generally, doubled up and riding on side-saddles, their bandaged and sandalled feet joggling recklessly to the caterpillar propulsive jog of the favored donkey. You always saw their approach indicated by the red sparks of their cigarettes, breaking through the white dust-clouds that wrapped them. As to the raisin-boxes, which were all stamped and branded, they were banded together with grass ropes. The boys ran by the sides of the donkeys, shouting out their names—Pepe, Juan or Marquita—for endearment, and occasionally thwacking a truant beast that strayed to nibble at road-side patches of Indian corn, or some thorny-looking bush that stuck itself spitefully out of the black way-side sand. It was a sorry meal; but then the epicure, you must remember, was only an ass. Poor creature, he had never read a cookery-book. Every now and then, as troop after troop, with more or less speed, scuffled and jostled past, I heard a lusty ballad about a certain Don Antonio or El Campeador, break out and quicken into a chorus, nasal but stirring.

These were the raisins that will smoke at many a Christmas table at home. I shall see them at Mrs. P's and Mr. S's, and shall little think that those were the old friends I saw driving along in the small boxes on the sea-shore of Malaga. I now am burning hot; then I shall be pinched with cold, and amongst a crowd of eager, happy faces, shall forget all about Hiccup, my Rosinante, and grave El Moro.

Now and then, at a bend of the sea-side road which sloped down to the sea, where a stranded Dutch ship still held up one drowning arm out of the water, we would come to a patient donkey, standing by an alarmed boy kneeling over a white pile of square brick-shaped boxes which had fallen to the ground, owing to some unlucky flaw in the cord that is usually twisted and knotted a thousand times round, over and under the precious cases that contain the future Christmas plum-puddings of England. Woe to little Perez, should his strong-armed father guess the nature of his loitering, if one lid be split, or one box leak out its withered grapes. Now laggard at a wine-stall canters past us to join the caravan of his companions. Now a dozen boys who have leagued together for mischief or talk, or perhaps a bath in some quiet pool under a sun-scorched rock, huddle past in a rough trot, trying to make up for lost time. All day, from dark and dawn to sunset and dusk, these strings and trains of pack-asses, with their smoking, tramping, side-saddle drivers, pass us in twos, threes and dozens at a time, for the vintage has begun on the low, red earth-hills, and the raisins are drying fast on the hot terraces of rock round Velez Malaga, at the foot of the Sierra, where the Moors held out so long against the Christians.

By road, you must not imagine a sharp, defined, level billiard-board Macadam road, with tomb-stone records of departed miles and banked terrace side-walks. Oh, no! This is quite another thing. Even just under the castle of Malaga it was but a lane, ankle-deep in black dust, rutted and stony; and now, as we leave the sea, with the wreck and the dancing, bare-legged fisherwomen who, knee deep in tumbling surf, are dragging in a net. It is a mere sand track bordered by desert, where nothing is grown but sea holly and a few abnormal weeds; places to mere sea-beach, loose, grey and shifting, with here a white cuttle-fish carcass, there a dry star-fish. There are beautiful glimpses, however, of sea, under rock and round points, and I am sorry when we turn abruptly to the left and leave a shore which is wild enough for mermaid dances or syren's carollings. It reminded me of the wild coast Don Juan, in Molière's play, is thrown upon.

Now we begin to pass long avenues hedged by huge cacti twelve feet high or more—their great, semi-tubular, thorny plumes flaunting far above my horse's head—their strange guttered leaves jagged like sharks' jaws, and sometimes the dry stalk of their dead flower stretching up from them as thick as a sapling ground ash, and at the base of the circumference of a strong man's arm. Miles of these till I know their metallic woru spiked fronds, and snapped, jagged tumble of growth by heart—oriental and unreal as they are; and then come intermingling miles of prickly pear, growing like prickly flat fish matted together, and at all strange corners and angles studded with fruit as large as eggs, ripe and unripe, the unripe green and fleshy, the ripe of a dull unhealthy red—the food of Spanish kings and Spanish beggars. They are such things as I should use to decorate the country of an ogre king in a pantomime; for they look gigantic, antediluvian and maliciously eccentric. For fences they would keep out an army, their stalks harden into knotty stubs, gnarled and tough as forest wood.

I and El Moro drew bridle at some small farm, where a rugged gipsy sort of woman would be driving a donkey that, fastened to a yoke, kept plodding lazily round in a circle turning the noria (the anaoura of the Moors) or large water-wheel, which, covered at intervals with red water-jars, kept dipping them into the well and discharging their contents into the garden reservoir.

Why did we stop when it was getting so burning and fiery hot? To buy a draught of water from a green pipkin, and to give our horses each a precious half-penny worth of water out of the roadside tank. How we turned up our elbows, and how the horses sucked and panted and drained! Even the mill-wheel donkey made the event of our halt a pretext for stopping, and was only roused by a shout and a clattering ignoble wallop that sent him on, twitching his ears and swinging his rope of a tail deprecatingly. At every hut we pass there are calabashes tied up for the passing traveller who wishes to buy water, and generally a rude stall with a dirty decanter of wine and some greasy tumblers to attract the muleteers. But we want to get to Velez Malaga before noon; and push on. Sometimes there are opaque-looking grapes and shelly, earthy-looking pomegranates, or a melon with a green slashed sample sliced out of its circumference.

Hotter! hotter! What will it come to? Shall we not be shrivelled or turned to statuettes? More donkeys trumpeting to each other, and winding down from the distant rock angles, by the red crumbly earth-hill, green with vines, where the white-walled hacienda, fenced in with orange-trees, stands like a beacon to this winding road, where we only begin to ascend by a viaduct that winter torrents roll under, and under the Carthaginian martello-tower on the cliff, now left for the hawk and lizard to settle their differences in.

"Did Hannibal build that?" I ask El Moro.

"It's only an old castle," replies my unantiquarian guide, loading with brown dust-tobacco the white paper tube of his fourth cigarette.

Now the scene of my Spanish panorama changes; for I leave the undulating red hills and their procession of stubby vines and trend away to the left through a low lane shaded (a blessing on that word!) by hedges, or rather groves, of immense green rushes, with stalks like wild cane, and willow leaves always on the stir. They are twice my height, and I slash at them as if I was charging a phalanx of Mussulmans; for Don Quixote is in my mind, and I am in the old region of the water-loving Moor.

Now the rich farms of the Sultan Boabdil are before me, and I amble past broad, hedgeless fields, where the sweet green melons—globes of liquid honey to the taste—lie weltering about, surrounded by a dry entanglement and eordage of withered branch and tendril. There are fields of sugar-cane, too, green and pleasant to the eye, already high as ripe wheat, though not to be bled and cut till spring; low-batateras, or sweet potatoes, fantastic-shaped jagged leaves; tracts of indigo, and enclosures of white tasseling maize. There is pepper, too, and there are orange tomatoes and orchards of pomegranates; and everywhere through this Eden rippling canals of running water—the sweetest music to the ear in a climate all but tropical. Here, too, are hedges of my old friend the prickly pear, rough as lions' tongues or flattened crusted hedgehogs, and, everywhere among the dusty evergreen trees and blossoms I hear the droning hum of the cicada; now like a fairy spinning wheel, now metallically sharp and gustily restless and monotonous. It singularly affects the excited mind does the chink and singing clatter of these invisible insects hid among the aloes. You are alone; there are no birds singing; it must be to you they call. What do they say? What do they want? They are in the trees, too, and ten feet high among the red-green fruit of that prickly pear, and up behind the green scoops of the aloes, and all singing in whirring unison and at once, with a metallic pulse as if the heat had become vocal. The sound is as of a factory at work, deafening and shrill. We have left the mules laden with planks and raisin-boxes, the crumbling Carthaginian seaside towers, water-mills, creaking, straining, and splashing, wine-stalls with resting muleteers, cliffs, desert commons and sloping vineyards. We leave oxen—patient, waddling beasts—dragging at a snail's pace, high matted carts. We left savage looking fishermen staggering fifteen miles to market with yoked panuiers of glittering fish upon their sturdy, sunburnt necks. More dry, dusty beds of winter streams, more herdsmen gnawing melons, more fishermen mending nets under tents; and we reach, amid a pressing fury of growing heat, the place of our noon-day siesta—thanking God for breakfast after our eight hours' ride.

They had no butter; for the Spaniards get all they use, salt, stale, and smelling, from Holland; no cheese, because the Spaniards do not care for cheese; so, at last, weary, vexed and burnt up with the glare of the last few hours' ride, I threw myself down on the landlord's bed over the stables, and went to sleep till the horses had fed and rested.

I had now to cross the Tejada mountains, on whose tops nothing but the wild rosemary and a few aromatic shrubs grow. I have to reach to-night Alhama, the Roman and Moorish city of hot springs, the unclean mountain Cheltenham of Spain only accessible by muleteers.

We trot slowly in the face of a raging sun you dare not look at, past the trim Alameda, with its avenue of young dry trees, and its benches on which a few loafers are sleeping. We get out into lanes and gardens, opening to the level dusty plains, lined with water-courses that are formed by the grey dust and stony detritus from the Tejada mountains. There is no road now at all, only a padded-out track in the dust, such as leads you across the black lava dust round Vesuvius.

We ford shallow purling streams, and work round a river in which muleteer boys are bathing with intense delight. We pass dusty bloodless olive-trees of great age, that remind me of Palestine, and cross brooks which are fringed by purple oleanders. Now a stony dusty climb, as round the base of Snowdon, till we make a certain windmill, at the mouth of a gorge that has been two hours tantalizingly in sight. More dusty rock and barren mule track, bedropped here and there with gnawed melon-rinds, and we come suddenly upon a green valley of orange-trees, hidden in a scooped-out bowl of the mountains, beautiful as a glimpse of the enchanted gardens that lured Thalaba into sudden rapture in the Desert, and bright as the Happy Valley of Rasselas. How glossy green and burnished the round serrated leaves are; how close-grained and seamed the light brown trunks; why, in spring, when the white blossom is out, this valley must have the perfume of Paradise, and the scent as of the wings of encamping angels, floated hither on eastward clouds. To guard it as with drawn swords wreathed with green, stand the dark eypresses, those patient, watchful trees of one fixed idea of stuck-upedness and gloomy hypochondria. I look for the omega-shaped palm, but it is not there: yet there is the fan-leaved tamarisk, and the Egyptian lupin, in the gardens, and children picking the tunas, with clothes-peg hooks fastened to long spear-handles. As for the orange-trees, their fruit is still in light green glossy globes, and is not yet turned to the redder gold of perfect ripeness.

It is all very well to talk of Paradise, but I know, on the mountains where you catch your first purple glimpse of the Sierra Nevada, I shall pass rows of murder-crosses with "Pray for the soul of Sancho Panza," killed here, such a date, and so on. So I will push on, while it may be called to-day, up these white burnt mountains to the Byron's Ay de mi Alhama, or, it may be, Ay de mi for the friend of Hodgins, of the Mounted Bombardiers.

Now, hotter and hotter—with my red and green umbrella up (when I don't use it to whack Hiccup,) and El Moro, whom the heat makes sullen and silent, with his handkerchief streaming down the back of his neck—we enter a mountain village, up green and water-splashed sloping lanes. Everywhere a hot seented steam of drying raisins rises in the fiery golden air. From every white-washed house you hear the smith's hammer pound and tinkle, as he coopers-up Malaga raisin casks. Under every open shed, thatched with dry reeds, you see busy carpenters planing and shaping those little raisin boxes that adorn the Christmas windows of London grocers. Down the rocks come more mules, laden with boxes. We have scarcely room to pass them, especially when a water-course boils and bubbles on the right hand side of the rocky pathway. The dark-eyed village girls are beating clothes clean in the rivulet below us. Under the sheds are old women, sorting dry yellow maize husks, to stuff mattresses with: and others are plaiting the grass cordage that is used in tying the boxes on the mules and donkeys.

At last, after miles of these burning mountains, by degrees, as we leave man and man's home, and rise higher and higher, through defiles where the mailed Moors must have poured down often to succor Alhama, or threaten the Velez valleys, the sun seems to get a little soothed and softened. We get up to higher tracts, cloven with water-courses, as by earthquake fissures.

It was late when we got to Alhama, which we approached by a road that traversed dreadful ravines, and which compelled me to dismount from Hiccup, and lead that fitful beast now more stammering and intermittent in pace than ever. In the darkness, the yawning gulfs at the side of the road looked abysses of purgatory, and we both gave a hearty and involuntary exclamations of satisfaction when the twinkling lights of Alhama broke upon us from what seemed the bottom of a well, down which we seemed doomed to ever wind and wind, jaded and forlorn, from dusk to midnight. More stony and tumbly the road became, more rutted, and unsafe, and moss-trooperish; but at last we wound round all the screw, and crawled into Alhama, sore not of foot, but wearied to the bone.

I soon secured a room away from the sort of stable courtyard and blacksmith's kitchen, which was crowded with muleteers; ordered a charcoal fire to be irritated and put on its mettle; and, seeing the horses first both put to their nigh-gard but wholesome meal of chopped straw, which is the horse-diet of Spain, stumbled up the brick stairs to my bedroom—a white-washed enclosure, with no bed, and no furniture but a chair and a rickety table. It was a caravanserai room, and that is all.

A grinning Mariternes soon put this to rights, rattled in a trestle-bed, shook it in place, put on clean sheets and a motley counterpane; brought a great pitcher of water, which I kept for five minutes at my mouth, and only dropped at last from exhaustion; she fetched clean towels; shaking nearly everything that she could shake in my face, and calling out, "Muy limpio"—my own words, tolled out so often, and at so many Spanish inns. Then eggs, bacon, a bottle of wine, thick and strong, some fruit, and some fat chocolate, that ran over the cup in a brown paste; that was my supper. Didn't I sleep afterwards, till daybreak and past! when we started again for the mountains.

FEW FRIENDS.—A nobleman, extremely rich but a miser, stopping to change horses at Athlone, the carriage was surrounded by paupers, imploring alms, to whom he turned a deaf ear, and drew up the glass. A ragged old woman, going round to the other side of the carriage, bawled out, in the old peer's hearing, "Please you, my lord, just chuck one tin penny out of your coach, and I'll answer it will trate all your friends in Athlone."

DUMAS has written a Life of Julius Caesar, wherein he takes precisely opposite ground to that of Louis Napoleon.

HAWTHORN AND MAY-DAY.

HAWTHORN flowers have been identified with the floral games of May and the beauties of Spring from time immemorial. Their scent is said to be not only reviving to the spirits, but to have the power of counteracting poison. They are regarded as the emblem of hope, and were carried by girls in the wedding processions of the ancient Greeks; they were laid on the altar of Hymen which was lighted with torches made of the wood. The Troglodytes tied bunches of the hawthorn to their dead when they were buried. In some parts of France the hawthorn is called Lepine (noble,) because it is supposed to have been the thorn used for crowning our Saviour, and the country people believe that it always utters groans and sighs on Good Friday. Others put a bunch of hawthorn in their hats during a thunder storm to guard them from lightning. The most remarkable legend connected with the hawthorn is that of the Glastonbury thorn. It is said that Joseph of Arimathea, after the burial of Christ, came to England, attended by twelve companions, to found the first Christian church in that island, and, guided by divine impulse, he proceeded to Glastonbury for that purpose. It was Christmas-day when he arrived at the spot, where he had been commanded to build a church in honor of the Virgin Mary, and finding that the natives did not appear inclined to believe in his mission, he prayed to God to perform a miracle to convince them. The prayer was immediately answered, and, on striking his staff into the ground, it immediately shot forth leaves and blossoms. The legend adds that the thorn is still in existence and still blooms annually on Christmas-day.

The French have a legend that on the day of the massacre of St. Bartholomew, on August 25th, an old hawthorn in the churchyard of St. Innocent, in Paris, came into blossom a second time.

The poets who have written on the hawthorne are almost as numerous as those who have written on the Rose. Chaucer, in his Court of Love, makes all his court on May-day go forth "both most and lest, to fetch the flouris fresh, and branche and bloome," and

"Marke the faire blooming of the Hawthorne tree,
Who finely clothed in a robe of white,
Fills full the wanton eye with May's delight."

And Shakspeare, in Henry VI., says:

"Gives not the hawthorn bush a sweeter shade
To Shepherds looking on their silly sheep
Than doth a rich embroidered canopy
To Kings who fear their subjects' treachery?"

Perhaps no poet has ever conjured up a more beautiful picture of the hawthorn than Goldsmith in his Deserted Village.

"The Hawthorn bush with seats beneath the shade,
For talking age or whispering lovers made."

It is amongst the early-leaving trees, and none put forth a sunnier, richer tint. And then its blossoms—they are everything one would wish; their perfume and appearance are alike exquisite, and fully entitle it to the post of honor assigned it of being "the virgin flag of Spring." It also has another charm: concealed in its flowery recesses, the little birds "warble their native wood notes wild," and seem as if they would repay it for their winter's sustenance by the sweetness and variety of their strains. Burns, the poet of nature, makes frequent allusion to this circumstance thus, in the "Relation of Bruar Water:"

"And for the little songster's nest
The close embowering thorn."

And in another poem, he again introduces it—

"Within yon milk-white hawthorn bush,
Among her nestlings, sits the thrush;
Her faithful mate will share her toil,
Or wi' his song her cares beguile."

He also says:

"The scented birk and hawthorn white,
Across the pool their arms unite,
Alike to screen their birdies' nest."

The custom of going a-Maying—that is, going out early on the morning of the first of May to gather branches of hawthorn flowers—is of very great antiquity. The Greeks and Romans gathered the May in honor of Flora, to whom the plant was dedicated, and whose festival began on May-day; and the Greeks even of the present time preserve the memorial of this custom by hanging a garland of hawthorn flowers against their doors on the first of May. In Britain, Stowe tells us that Henry VIII., with his Queen Catharine and the Lords and Ladies of their Court rode out a-Maying from Greenwich to Shooters' Hill, and in a curious MS., entitled the State of Elton School, A. D. 1560, it is stated that "on the day of St. Phillip and St. James, (May 1st) if it be fair weather, and the master grants leave, the boys who choose it may rise at 4 o'clock to gather May branches, if they can do it without wetting their feet." In decking the May-pole with flowers, a branch of hawthorn was formerly always put on the top, but since the alteration of the style, in 1752, May-day occurring eleven days earlier, the hawthorn is seldom in blossom on that day, except in the southern part of England. The hawthorn is the badge of the clan Ogilvy. The hawthorn will not do well unless in good dry soil; if in damp ground, it will become stunted and covered with mosses and lichens; it is well adapted for open and exposed situations, and will stand the wind better than most trees. As a hedge plant it has been used for ages, and nothing is more beautiful. There are over one hundred varieties, containing all shades of white, pink and deep red both of the single and doubled flowered kinds. They can be grown from the seeds and also propagated by grafting and budding.

Plants have been known to have existed for a century or two and from 30 to 40 feet high with trunks upward of three feet in diameter at one foot from the ground. The hawthorn has been found in all parts of the world—Europe, Asia, America and the northern parts of Africa.

THE HUMBLE-BEE.

BURLY, dozing humble bee,
Where thou art is clime for me.
Let them sail for Porto Rique,
Far-off heats through seas to seek;
I will follow thee alone,
Thou animated torrid-zone!
Zigzag steerer, desert cheerer,
Let me chase thy waving lines;
Keep me nearer, me thy hearer,
Singing over shrubs and vines.

Insect lover of the sun,
Joy of thy dominion!
Sailor of the atmosphere;
Swimmer through the waves of air;
Voyager of light and noon;
Epicurean of June;
Wait, I prithee, till I come
Within earshot of thy hum—
All without is martyrdom.

When the south wind, in May days,
With a net of shining haze
Silvers the horizon wall,
And, with softness touching all,
Tints the humau countenance
With a color of romance,
And, infusing subtle heats,
Turns the sod to violets,
Thou, in sunny solitudes,
Rover of the underwoods,
The green silence dost displace
With thy mellow, breezy bass.

Hot midsummer's petted crone,
Sweet to me thy drowsy tone
Tells of countless sunny hours,
Long days, and solid banks of flowers;
Of gulfs of sweetness without bound
In Indian wildernesses found;
Of Syrian peace, immortal leisure,
Firmest cheer, and bird-like pleasure.

Aught unsavory or unclean
Hath my insect never seen;
But violets and bilberry bells,
Maple sap and daffodils,
Grass with green flag half-mast high,
Succory to match the sky,
Columbine with horn of honey,
Scented fern, and agrimony,
Clover, catchfly, adder's-tongue,
And brier-roses, dwelt among;
All beside was unknown waste,
All was picture as he passed.

Wiser far than human seer,
Yellow-breeched philosopher!
Seeing only what is fair,
Sipping only what is sweet,
Thou dost mock at fate and care,
Leave the chaff and take the wheat.
When the fierce northwestern blast
Cools sea and land so far and fast,
Thou already slumberest deep;
Woe and woe thou canst outsleep;
Want and woe, which torture us,
Thy sleep makes ridiculous.

[R. W. Emerson.]

A BALL AND A PEACOCK COSTUME.—The London Court Journal, in its Paris letter, has the following: "On Tuesday the first ball of the English Embassy was attended by a numerous assembly of French invités. Madame Rimsky Korsakow was the bright luminary of the festival. The eccentricity of her toilet did not detract from the admiration it inspired. Eccentricity is the order of the day, the fashions rising to the surface from the lowest to the highest, instead of descending, as formerly, from the most elevated ton gradually to the humblest of imitators. The lady, desirous of meeting no rival, had adopted the emblems of the peacock, and every ornament and article of dress brought to mind the glittering colors and shining plumes of Juno's bird. The dress was of white tulle, embroidered all over with Argus' eyes. A tunic, reaching from the waist to a little below the knee, was composed of striped velvet, recalling the colors of the peacock; bunches of peacock's feathers everywhere, held together by bouquets of emeralds and diamonds. It would have been hard if, with such tenacity as here displayed, she had not carried on her head some manifestation of her momentary worship; and a peacock, this time not dismembered and dismantled, but perfect in form, shape and color, adorned her forehead. The ornament was composed entirely of the finest brilliants and emeralds, the neck of the bird, with its crest, being formed of the most splendid sapphires. The whole was more curious and striking than strictly in accordance with taste, but Madame Rimsky Korsakow does but represent the tone and aspirations of the day."

WHY MR. WHYMPER CAMPED OUT.

IN July 1862, after two attempts on the Matterhorn with my friend Macdonald—in which we were cruelly and completely extinguished by the weather, we left this tent, (the article, from which we quote, discusses the right kind of Alpine tent) on the third arete, at a height of about 11,800 feet, and paid some attention to other mountains. I returned to Breuil after an absence of ten days; and while waiting for my guides, started one fine morning to see if the prospects were safe, taking with me provisions for the day, and anticipating neither danger nor difficulty in reaching the place, having passed over the ground six times already. I wound my way across the conloirs by the col, crossed it, climbed about 500 feet and found the tent in safety. No person who has not seen it can imagine the glorious view from this point; at least three-fourths of the ground over which the eye roams is composed of snow-fields, glaciers, and peaks; only in the direction of the Val Tournanche is there anything else, and in that, after following the valley to its termination and looking over the Eastern Graians, the Viso is seen at a distance of 98 miles towering over the masses of clouds which hover over the plains of Turin. Often as I had seen the view, at this time solitary and undisturbed, it burst upon me with all the freshness and strength of complete novelty, and any true mountaineer will understand how it came to pass that hours sped away unregarded, and that after satiating myself with avalanches off the Dent d'Hérens, the fine form of the Dent Blanche, the crags of the Rothhorn, the many summits of Monte Rosa, the Breithorn, and the scores of surrounding peaks, I found that the day was declining, and that barely time was left to return to Breuil.

I turned to the tent, unrolled it, and as I did so my fate was decided; three bottles of wine and other provisions emerged from its recesses. I set it up and turned again to the view; the sun was setting, and its rosy rays blending with the snowy blue had thrown a pale pure violet far as the eye could see; the valleys were drowned in a purple gloom, and the summits shone with unnatural brightness. As I sat in the door of my tent and watched the twilight change to darkness, the earth seemed less earthly and almost sublime, and it was impossible to stifle sentiment and repress enthusiasm; the stone-chairs chirped their evening hymn as they fluttered round their rocky nests; but theirs was the only sound; the world seemed dead, and I its sole inhabitant. By-and-bye, the moon, as it rose, brought the hills again into sight, and, by a judicious repression of detail, made the view yet more magnificent. I had been looking vaguely about for some time before I noticed something in the sky toward the south. I could not well make out what, which hung like a great glow-worm in the air at an infinite distance; and it was some time before I could realize the fact that it was the moonlight glittering on the great snow slope on the north side of the Viso. Shivering at last, I entered the tent, made my coffee, and passed a very comfortable night alone.

In the morning it seemed a shame to waste the day (Saturday) by going down at once to Breuil, when I was so high and the mountain so handy. There can, at least, be no harm, I thought, in going as high as I have been before, which was to the foot of the great tower. So on I went with my axe in hand and forty feet or so of rope coiled round my waist. The chimney offered little difficulty, but the snow slope above it took a long time, as the steps, from its steepness, were necessarily of the very largest coal-scuttle size. When I got to the foot of the tower it certainly seemed a pity to turn back, so I went a little further to see what was round the corner, and when I got round, the mountain seemed more interesting than ever; the pinnacles behind it were wagging in the wind. Without exaggeration, one could take hold of huge Egyptian-like blocks, ten or more feet high, and rock them backward and forward. The natives who have been on this part of the mountain always term it "the cockscorn," so wonderfully it is serrated.

Strangely fascinated, on I went, and I think most mountaineers would have done the same. The work was so varied that there was none of that weariness which sometimes comes over one on an ascent. Higher up, when nearly on a level with the summit of the Dent d'Hérens, the arete became excessively narrow; you could sit across, rock it about, and speculate on which side it would fall; there wasn't a pin to choose between either. Sometimes a massive block twenty feet long was lying across a little one which was hourly becoming less, and at last, of course, down would come the big one. And this is the mountain which a writer has said presents no aspect of destruction about its cliffs: "it is, on the contrary, an unaltered monument seemingly sculptured long ago." Every one knows the passage—a fine one undoubtedly, but not in accordance with facts. The Matterhorn rains down, day and night, rocks and stones, and stones and rocks; it will one day be as famous for its avalanches as the Jungfrau is for hers.

I turned back at last, and being foolish enough to leave my axe behind in passing the tent, slipped in consequence on the top of one of the couloirs near the col: by a mere chance I was stopped, and, but for it, should not be able to narrate the glories of my solitary bivouac. I have, I think, sufficiently explained how it came to pass that I found myself at night on the Matterhorn on that occasion. Some amiable critics have announced that I was endeavoring to make an ascent by myself; I should be the first to laugh at any idea so absurd; it was a combination of accidental circumstances that caused me to get alone on that day higher than any other person had previously been.

THEATRICAL TALK.

MR. DAN SETCHELL has achieved immense popularity in a very short time. Maguire's Opera House was crowded on Monday, when he made his first appearance, and each evening since every seat has been occupied. Mr. Setchell chose a good farce and a bad farce for his first performance, and pleased the audience equally in each. The good farce was Ici on parle Français, one of the best ever written, the bad one, One Thousand Milliners Wanted, which is sad trash, but makes people laugh whether they will or no. No one could keep their gravity when Mr. Setchell makes his appearance as "Madame Vanderpant;" his impersonation of this character is one of the most irresistibly comic things we have witnessed on the stage for many a long day. The company at the Opera House afford the comedian efficient support. There is good comedy material in Mrs. Perry, Mr. Thorne, Mr. Mayo, and Mr. Aldrich. While Mrs. Saunders is, as everyone knows, perfectly up in that line of business. On Wednesday and Thursday Dombey and Son was played: the feature in this was of course Mr. Setchell's "Captain Cuttle," though there were many others deserving of notice. Mrs. Sophie Edwin made the most of the character of "Edith Dombey," and shared the applause with the star. Mr. Mayo's "Jack Bunsby" was an excellent piece of eccentric comedy acting. Mrs. Saunders as "Mrs. Skewton," had ample field for the display of her comic talent, of which of course she availed herself. Mrs. Perry gained new laurels by impersonation of the little snap dragon "Becky Sharp," and, in fact, each part was admirably filled. Last night Mr. Setchell, as "Aminadab Sleek" in the comedy of The Serious Family, convulsed the audience with laughter, and gave new proof of his ability to fill the place the death of Burton left vacant. This afternoon the ladies and children have a chance to laugh at this wonderfully funny comedian, without keeping late hours, as he will, for their especial delectation, appear in two pieces—Ici on parle Français and 1,000 Milliners Wanted, which are sure to create most uproarious mirth. To-night, at the request of many who were unable to obtain admission during the week, Dombey and Son will be repeated, and the performance will conclude with 1,000 Milliners Wanted. Those who wish to obtain seats will do well to go in good season.

TOUCHSTONE.

THEATRICALS AT THE EAST.

DESPITE the hard times, the theatres at the East are doing a good business. We clip the following from our exchanges:

Mr. and Mrs. Charles Kean were engaged to perform eleven nights at the Broadway Theatre, New York. In consequence of the great rush to witness their performances, the seats were sold at public auction, on the 10th of April. The amount realized for the private boxes was $495; 160 orchestra chairs, $5,120; twenty dress circle seats at $6 75 premium and $2 each seat, $575; the whole amount of sales being $6,165. From New York, they are to go to Buffalo, under an engagement of six nights, commencing July 24th, with the manager of the Metropolitan Theatre.

Mr. Frank Lawler and Mrs. Emily Jordan at last advices, were at Griswold's Opera House, Troy. They opened with Aurora Floyd, and despite the inclemency of the weather, drew excellent houses. Friday evening, March 30th, Mrs. Jordan took a benefit, on which occasion Leah, the Forsaken, and Barney the Baron, were presented, in the former piece Mrs. Jordan personating "Leah," and Mr. Lawler "Joseph." Between the pieces Mr. Lawler recited "Shamus O'Brien." The house was densely crowded.

Mr. and Miss Richings, were to perform at a matinée to be given at the Philadelphia Academy of Music, April 22d, when the opera of the Child of the Regiment was to be performed.

Miss Lotta commenced an engagement at the Front Street Theatre, Baltimore, April 18th. She was engaged by Mr. B. E. Whitman.

Yankee Locke and Mrs. W. H. Leighton commenced a two weeks engagement at the Lexington, Ky., Theatre, on the 17th of April, and were to go thence to Cincinnati, on May 1st, for one week, Indianapolis, May 15th for twelve nights, and McVicker's Theatre, Chicago, June 12th for two weeks.

The Menken is running her "fiery untamed steed," at the Theatre Royal, London. From there she visits Glasgow, Liverpool and then returns to Astley's, London, to produce her new piece, The Child of the Sun. Adah Isaacs speaks of returning to New York with her new pieces, and returning to Europe in the fall, as she is engaged to play in French, at the Theatre du Chatelet, Paris. She met with great success in Glasgow, every seat being sold in advance.

McKean Buchanan and daughter, had done a good business at the Academy of Music, Albany. They were advertised to appear at Cairo, Ill., on the 24th ult., at St. Louis, May 8th, and in Leavenworth May 22d.

Artemus Ward is still upon his winding way. He appeared at Springfield, Ill., on the 2d ult., and was announced to bloom at Bloomington on the 3d, Peoria 4th, Galesburg 5th, and at Burlington, Iowa, on the 6th of May.

Miss Avonia Jones arrived in New York on the 5th of April, from New Orleans, where she had been playing an engagement.

Forrest at last advices, was playing King Lear at Niblo's Garden, N. Y., to crowded houses.

Edwin Booth has returned to the Winter Garden, N. Y., after performing a successful engagement at Boston. He opened with Richelieu.

Mr. and Mrs. Barney Williams commenced an engagement at the Boston Theatre, April 17th.

Mrs. John Wood was the recipient of a complimentary benefit on her re-appearance at the Olympic. London Assurance was performed, Mrs. Wood appearing as "Lady Gay Spanker" and Mr. Mortimer as "Dazzle."

Miss Bateman was playing Leah, the Forsaken, with great success at the Park Theatre, Brooklyn.

Barnum has a new novelty in the shape of a wax figure of John Kennedy, the incendiary and rebel spy, who was executed a short time since.

Max Maretzek was to receive complimentary benefits in New York and Brooklyn, tendered it is said, by the artists of the company.

Uncle Tom's Cabin has been revived at the Old Bowery with Mrs. G. C. Howard as "Topsy," the original representative of the character. It has made another furor and crowds the house every evening.

At the New Bowery, the Gaelic Chief has proved a great success.

Gaylor's burlesque of Oil on the Brain draws immense crowds at Wood's Minstrel Hall. It has been produced there in admirable style, with splendid scenery and scenic effects.

DIAMONDS—PHILOSOPHY.

ONE reason, perhaps, why ladies are so seldom learned is that Philosophy is the natural enemy of their most darling art—that of dress. It is always making some rude discovery or other with regard to their cherished ornaments. Beauty, sweeping to her triumphs at the opera or ball, stately in silks and radiant in jewels, is to unphilosophical eyes something marvellous. The common mind is satisfied to contemplate the delightful sight, and to believe that silks and satins, pearls and diamonds, all the armory of her charms in fact, were created on purpose to make her irresistible, from some such mysterious source of loveliness as herself. They are no more inclined to question whence and how all her weapons of gentle conquest are derived, than the enchanted world was to ask where Aphrodite came from when she rose one fine morning upon the waves of the Ægean Sea. But Philosophy is a morose and an insensible bore, who sneers at all these pretty things, and gets out his crucible and microscope to examine them. * * Even her jewels—the flashing lightnings of her Olympian throne—cannot escape Philosophy; her pearls, he says, are what an oyster does when he is tickled, instead of laughing; her malachites are carbonate of copper; her jaspers mere flint-stones; her jet is cannel coal; and her diamonds—her regal, glorious diamonds, which have come down in the family of Beauty ever since the sea-spray crystalized upon Venus into armlets, carcanets and parures about the neck and wrists of the Goddess of Love—Philosophy says they are nothing but carbon, and that some day, out of black-lead or coke, or common charcoal at sixpence a basket, he will make such glittering trash to any amount!

Nevertheless, Beauty wisely turns away from the horrid sage, and continues to dote upon diamonds; so do we all—those who own them, and those who only see them glitter through the jeweller's lattices, or upon the breasts of the Queens of Fashion. How much does it matter, after all, what they are, and what they are made of? for, if it come to that the lovely wearer herself is composed, as those disagreeable people tell us, of a lot of ugly chemicals, which never yet prevented a heart from breaking for her sake. "Down with philosophers," then, rather than dispense with those beautiful and rare stones, which sparkle in the lamp-light like earthly rainbows, and which condense upon a lady's little finger the wealth of a province or the ransom of a prince. They are lovely, and that is enough for Loveliness. They are rare too, and that is better still; for if Loveliness could wear the dew-drops of an April morning, of which the milkmaid's foot scatters ten thousand, we fear, besides being damp, that she would call them "common." Being beautiful and rare, however, the world is in love with them, and all of us are fascinated by the history of great diamonds. When the Exhibition of 1851 opened, people went first of all to the gold cage of the Koh-i-noor, to gaze at the little prismatic pebble on its violet cushion. An Indian historian has told us that that gem is unlucky, and has brought death or disaster to everybody that ever owned it. We think we know a great many persons who would chance the ill-luck to be master of "the Mountain of Light." Imagine yourself carrying a computed value of two millions sterling in the corner of a waistcoat-pocket, as you might do if you owned it. Then there is the famous Pitt or Regent diamond, which the Earl of Chatham's grandfather bought for £20,000, and sold—keen old connoisseur—for £135,000; a stone that Napoleon I. wore on the hilt of his sword at his coronation, and which is still "the jewel" of the jewels of France. The Pigot diamond, too, which now glistens, as they say, upon the dusky Queen of an Egyptian harem; the Emperor of Austria's great egg brilliant: the Nassick stone, of the very finest water in the world; and that great Muscovite gem which was once the eye of Buddha till impious hands blinded the god and sold his "eyesight" to Prince Orloff, who got for it out of Catherine of Russia £90,000 in roubles, an annuity of £400 a year, and his patent of nobility. Beauty is quite right, that such historiettes are not trifling, and their subjects—their beautiful, dancing, glancing, gorgeous subjects—are things for the feminine heart to break about with admiration and longing. The dames of India call them affectionately "santosh," "contentments," as if there were not much left to long for in the world when once a fine and fair cut diamond glitters on breast or forehead.

Among "fashionable movements" recently recorded, one of this distinguished family, "the great Diamonds," has just changed its residence. The Sauci stone belonged, as far back as the heralds of the Ars Lapidaria trace it, to Charles the Bold of Burgundy. Thence it came into the keeping of the Italian House whose name it bears. But it was too magnificent for private life, and very early in its glittering career it passed into the jewel chamber of France. Louis XIV. wore it at his coronation, so did Louis XV.; it was set in a sceptre, and afterwards in a crown of state. But when the mob sacked the Tuileries, in 1789, the Sauci diamond got into sansculotte keeping, and was lost sight of till the Queen of Ferdinand VII. of Spain purchased it for a sackful of doubloons. She gave it to Godoy, Prince of Peace, and from his unworthy hands it passed to the Demidoffs, for your Russians are great collectors of diamonds. Now it has just been sold for £21,000 to Sir Jamesetjee Jejeebhoy, the Parsee Baronet, of Bombay, and even in India, the home of jewels, it is likely to shine peerless. What stories these great gems would tell if they could speak! and what is to come of them all, and what are we to do for proverbs of costliness and beauty, if Philosophy keeps its word, and some day manufactures their rivals of any size and water you like. Happily, though the philosophers can burn the diamond and make coke of the "Mountain of Light," they cannot yet crystalize it back again into the sparkling stone. The only sources still for these bright munitions of Beauty are mines like Golconda and Ellore, where the Hindoo bends for patient days over the gravel-drift, and the Brazilian streams, where the negro hunts for "the stone of seventeen carats" which gives him liberty. We cannot match Nature's workshop yet, at these dainty colors and imperishable crystals; we can melt our pearls, like Cleopatra, but we must go to the oysters to find them. The Czar of Russia is collecting, they say, a necklace for his Czarina of stones like a pigeon's egg, not one of which must ever have been worn on any neck before, and each of which must be of perfect hue and unimpeachable form. The Imperial fancy is not a folly yet. Her Majesty will long carry the reveries of a kingdom upon her breast and defy philosophers; while Beauty, taking heart at the Sauci diamonds, may still be proud of her jewel-case.—English paper.

INTERIOR ITEMS.

Robert Carter fell into a cellar in Nevada, May 6th, dislocating and otherwise injuring his thigh bone.

Hon. Alex. Badlam has been elected Secretary of the Napa Railroad Company.

A. G. Richardson has been elected President of the California Stage Company in place of James Hayworth, resigned.

The Fair of the State Agricultural Society, for 1865, will commence Monday, Sept. 11th, and continue six days.

The Mariposa Gazette of May 6th, says: "We are informed that Mason and Henry, the murderers, have been captured by a party of soldiers from Visalia. Mason, it is said, was killed."

The Stockton Independent of May 9th states that since the 1st of January, 1,309 tons of copper ore have been shipped from that city.

Dick Durand, well known as a minstrel, was shot and killed at San Lorenzo, recently, while quarreling with a person whose name is not given.

Opals, believed to be genuine, have been found in Calaveras county. They are not first-class stones, but the owners hope, from present indications, they will soon get those of the finest quality.

The Sacramento Valley and Placerville railroad is completed to Dugan's station, six miles from Latrobe and forty-two miles from Sacramento. The road is graded and ready for the rails to Shingle springs, ten miles from Placerville.

The Jackson Despatch, a violent secession sheet, has been suppressed by order of Gen. McDowell. L. P. Hall and Penney, who have been connected with the paper, are in custody.

The Stockton Independent appeared May 6th in a new dress, and enlarged. It is one of the most enterprising and ably-edited newspapers in California, and we observe with pleasure these evidences of prosperity.

"FURTHERUPTOWN."

[The latest parody on "Excelsior" is contained in the following letter to the New York Evening Post. The sentiment belongs to no peculiar latitude and will be equally appreciated by house-hunters in San Francisco. Says the writer: "The following stanzas, lately recovered from unpublished manuscripts of the nineteenth century, and attributed to a writer of the middle age, are believed to have suggested to the poet Longfellow the form of his famous poem, 'Excelsior.' They were lately sung by a distracted house-hunter in this city to a social assembly, comprising certain other distracted house-hunters, by whom it was resolved that they be sent to the Evening Post :]

Tired to death, but walking fast,
Along Broadway one night there passed
A youth who wore a pretty nice
Umbrella, with this strange device,
"Furtheruptown!"

His anxious eyes and wreny feet
Hunted the houses in each street;
And like a New-Year's fish-horn rung
The accents of that unknown tongue
"Furtheruptown!"

In happy homes he saw the light
Of household fires gleam warm and bright;
Beyond, the spectral street-lump shone,
And from his lips escaped a groan,
"Furtheruptown!"

"Try not that street," the old man said;
"A tenement house is just ahead—
A public school is by its side;"
Then loud that clarion voice replied,
"Furtheruptown!"

"Oh stay," the broker said, "and rest;
This brown stone house will suit you best."
A tear stood in his bright blue eye,
Sadly he said, "The rent's too high;"
"Furtheruptown!"

"Beware of the livery stable's smell,
Beware the engine-house as well!"
This was the agent's last good-night—
A voice replied, far out of sight,
"Furtheruptown!"

At break of day, as heavenward
The Central Park policemen stared,
Watching the gathering sunbeams there,
A voice rang through the startled air,
"Furtheruptown!"

By following up the unusual sound,
A dying traveller they found,
Still grasping his no longer nice
Umbrella, with the strange device,
"Furtheruptown!"

There, in the Reservoir, they say,
"Drowned!" but beautiful he lay,
While somewhere over Bloomingdale
A voice fell like a rocket's tail,
"Furtheruptown!"

THE VILLAGE APPARITION.

A TRUE STORY.

THE minister of a small village in Germany had been six weeks in possession of his new parsonage. He had duly visited his new neighbors; the domestic arrangements were completed; and his accounts with the widow of his predecessor were finally adjusted. Pleased at the termination of this important business, which, owing to the integrity of both parties, had been transacted without the intervention of lawyers, the pastor left his study, delivered the parcel containing the balance which he had yet to pay, to be forwarded to the widow, and then seated himself under the lime-trees which overhung the entrance of his habitation. Here he was soon joined by his affectionate wife; they entered into conversation on the cheering prospect which promised them a decent provision, and the approach of those parental joys which they had not yet tasted.

A country blooming as a garden was extended before them. After a long succession of sultry days, a storm about noon had cooled the atmosphere. All nature had assumed a fresher appearance; the flowers were attired in gayer colors, and exhaled more fragrant perfumes; the soft breeze wanted about the glowing cheek of the husbandman, who, summoned by the evening bell, slowly returned with his implements to the peaceful cots of his village.

"Dear Dorothy," said the pastor, when his wife rose to make preparations for supper, "the heat from the past sultry weather is still very perceptible in the house. Suppose we take our supper this evening here under the lime-trees? We shall thus have an opportunity of airing the house thoroughly, and shall enjoy the beauty of the evening an hour longer in the open air."

"You take the word out of my mouth," replied his wife. "The evening, indeed, is too fine, and we shall certainly relish the pigeons, which are at the fire, and a nice salad, as well again here as in the close rooms."

No sooner said than done. With cheerful industry Dorothy hastened to the kitchen; the pastor fetched the table and chairs, laid the cloth, and even brought a bottle of wine out of the cellar. According to his general custom, this indulgence was reserved for Sundays or particular occasions; but this day, when, as the reader has been informed, he had so happily terminated the business of settling his accounts, seemed to him worthy of being made an exception: it was an important day for him, as it was not till now that he felt himself completely installed in his office and habitation. Dorothy soon made her appearance with the pigeons, and she, with her husband and his sister, who had followed them to lend her assistance in removing, and in their new domestic arrangements, sat down to the rural repast. It was seasoned by cheerful conversation and innocent mirth, whilst a late nightingale charmed their ears with his strains, and the worthy pastor quaffed the generous beverage out of a goblet on which, as an heir-loom of his grandfather's, he set a particular value, till the joyous tone of his mind was plainly expressed in his countenance. Thus the night stole upon them almost without their perceiving its approach. Dorothy was going to fetch a candle, but her husband detained her. "The evening, to be sure, is still fine," said he, "but the air grows cooler. You know, Dorothy, that you must take care of yourself. As soon as I have finished this glass, we will go in together." Scarcely had the pastor finished speaking—scarcely had Dorothy taken her seat again, when all at once both the females started up with shrieks of terror. The pastor looked about, and to his utter astonishment an apparition stood beside him.

It was a tall, elegant figure. The face, of exquisite beauty, seemed tinged with the roseate glow of evening; a rose-bud decorated its hair, which flowed in charming ringlets over a neck of snowy whiteness; a robe of azure blue, studded with stars of gold, covered its form; an effulgence resembling sunbeams encircled the angelic vision, which, with a look of inexpressible sweetness, seemed to invite the pastor to follow it.

The two ladies, as the reader has been already informed, had flown from their seats. The divine, attracted by the enchanting appearance of the phantom, rose and followed it. His wife and sister would have detained him, but he disengaged himself. When, however, the figure, moving on before him, directed his course towards the churchyard, his wife once more went up to him, clasped him in her arms, and entreated him with such earnestness and alarm to proceed no farther, that, in consideration of her state, he desisted from his intention. He turned back with her, promising not to follow the apparition; but he could not help asking, over and over again, how she could be afraid of a being, which, so far from having anything terrifying about it, rather looked like an angel from heaven, whose invitations could only be designed for some good purpose. Both stepped before the house-door, and watched the spirit, which proceeded to the wall of the churchyard, rose to the top of it, and disappeared.

The consequences of this adventure were, however, far from agreeable to the worthy pastor. The report of it was soon spread with various additions over the whole country; the minister acquired the character of a visionary, and the neighboring clergy, at the mention of his name, would turn up their noses, significantly shrug their shoulders, and talk a great deal about Swedenborg, Schropfer and Co.; nay, there were persons ill-natured enough to express their conviction that the phantom was created by the wine alone. The superintendent himself, who came a few weeks afterwards to introduce the pastor to his new congregation, when the other guests had retired after the dinner given on the occasion, began to make very circumstantial inquiries concerning the health of his host. "You are a man," continued he, "who are fond of the sciences, who have little domestic occupation, and, on account of the sequestered situation of the place, cannot expect much society. Under these circumstances, I am afraid you will stick too closely to your books and your writing-table, neglect that exercise which is so essentially necessary, and thus lay the foundation of those numberless complaints, which sooner or later are the attendants of hypochondria. Let me persuade you to avoid this, my dear colleague. Rather take abundance of exercise, and consider your studies as a medium of conveying aliment to your mind and assuaging your thirst of knowledge, but which should by no means be purchased at the expense of your health and cheerfulness."

"I can assure your reverence," replied the pastor, "that I have nothing to fear from the attacks of melancholy. I delight in rambling abroad to enjoy the beauties of Nature, and the charming environs of this place present irresistible inducements to me to gratify this inclination. I am likewise very fond of gardening, with which I amuse myself several hours a day. I sleep well, and my digestion is good. I have a flow of spirits that very rarely fails me, and I cultivate the sciences in such a manner that they rather afford me matter for recreation, and consequently for pleasure, than for gloomy meditations."

"Ah! yes," rejoined the superintendent, "this is always the language of you gentlemen: but such diseased persons are in the most dangerous way as fancy that they ail nothing. Beware my dear friend, and let me recommend to you plenty of exercise and a due proportion of medicine."

Our clergyman now began to imagine that there must be some particular reason for these exhortations. After pausing for some time, he thus addressed his visitor: "I am infinitely obliged to your reverence for the interest you take in my health; but it appears to me that you must have some particular motive for your well-meant advice, and therefore earnestly entreat you to favor me with an explanation."

"Well, then," answered the superintendent, "if you wish to know the real truth, I will tell you: I am informed you believe in the appearance of spirits. I have received such positive assurances of this fact, and from such respectable sources, that I cannot have any doubt on the subject. I have far too good an opinion of your understanding to seek the reason of it there, and must, of course, attribute it to some of those obstructions which at times operate so powerfully on the imaginations of persons possessing the strongest minds."

The matter was now perfectly clear to our divine. He perceived that the report of the apparition had reached the metropolis, and had occasioned the marked behavior of the superintendent, but from which business had before prevented him from paying so much attention as he had done on this day. He therefore related to him the whole affair with the utmost fidelity and simplicity, and added, "It could not be an optical deception; for whence could it have proceeded in a lonely village, so far from any high road? Neither could it have been any delusion of the senses; for the figure was not only seen at the same moment, and watched till its disappearance, by himself, but likewise by my wife, my sister, neighbor A.'s man, and neighbor B.'s maid, who all give the same description of it. What it was, or what it meant, whence it came, or whither it went, I know not, and I can do no more than repeat Hamlet's common-place observation, so often quoted on similar occasions: 'There are many things between heaven and earth which were never dreamt of by our philosophy.'"

The superintendent smiled, shook his head, and said no more; but next morning, as he mounted his chaise, he could not forbear calling once more to the pastor, "Remember the conversation we had yesterday, and my good advice. Plenty of exercise," etc., etc. The pastor bowed with a smile, which expired on his lips, as if suddenly checked by a sharp twitch of the toothache.

One day, in the summer of 17—, a stranger came to me, and delivered a letter from the lady of General M., who informed me in it, that "the bearer, Mr. S—, was an artist of great skill in optical deceptions, and who, in several exhibitions at H., had given great satisfaction to the public. As he intended to exhibit the same at C., she should consider herself obliged if I would endeavor to promote the views of Mr. S., who she was particularly anxious to serve." Mr. S., a man of considerable talents and prepossessing manners, soon found means to interest me in his favor, and I prevailed upon my father to allow him the use of a large empty apartment in the mansion in which we resided. As this apartment was upon the same floor with my room, I could not help having almost hourly occasions of seeing and speaking to the artist whilst employed in making his various arrangements. Sometimes he explained to me this or that part of his apparatus; at others he entertained me with an account of his travels, his residence in the principal cities of Germany, and his various adventures. Thus, among other things, he related to me what follows:

"In one of my journeys from Dresden to Frankfurt, I took it into my head to visit the beautiful valley of A. I therefore turned off from the high road, but about noon was overtaken by a storm, and obliged to stop at a village, because my automata had got wet under the canvas which covered my carriage. Whilst I was drying them, I availed myself of the opportunity to clean my mirrors, and was just going to pack up my apparatus again, when my wife pointed out to me a party, consisting, as I afterwards learned, of the minister of the place and two females, who were supping under the shade of the lime-trees before the door of the parsonage. In a fit of playful humor, she persuaded me to dish up an apparition, as a dessert for the company; and, as the parsonage was exactly opposite to my room on the ground floor of the inn, and only at a moderate distance, as the windows were low, and the party remained till late, I could not have had a better opportunity for complying with the wish of my frolicsome wife. I directed my mirror, and sent over a figure which I intended them to see. The ladies started with affright from their seats, but the pastor, a courageous man, followed the apparition, till one of the ladies, probably his wife, pulled him back, and I made the figure disappear at the wall of the churchyard. This event raised a great noise in the village. As I had entered the inn-yard by the back way, I had been noticed but by a few persons; on account of my puppets, I had kept my door locked; there were no children in the house, and at the time the apparition was seen, my host and his people, who took me for a dealer in toys, were engaged in housing a wagon-load of hay which had come in very late. I had therefore plenty of time to remove my apparatus, and thus to obviate all suspicion of my having any hand in the affair. The apparition was regarded as supernatural, and several of the inhabitants who talked over the subject, under my window, were of opinion that it was a token of death that would speedily happen at the parsonage, not only because the apparition had directed its course from that place to the churchyard, but also because the pastor's wife was, for the first time, in an 'interesting condition.'

"I know not how it happened," continued Mr. S., "that I purposely left these people in their error. I well knew how to appreciate the moral object of such phantasmagoric exhibitions; namely, to form delusive figures by the aid of optics, and by explaining the natural means employed for the purpose, to destroy the belief in supernatural appearances: I knew, moreover, that no man can calculate the consequences of an action, and it was therefore doubly my duty to clear up the matter as soon as the danger of my deception was exhibited in pretty strong colors by those superstitious expressions. Notwithstanding all this, I left the people in their absurd notions; and the mischief which I may have then occasioned still sometimes lies heavy upon my heart."

"As for this cause of uneasiness," I replied, "I am glad to have it in my power to relieve you from it. The family of the pastor of A. still enjoys good health; instead of having diminished, it has been increased by three robust, hearty boys; and the character of a visionary, which he acquired, may now be done away by the very natural explanation of this occurrence. At the same time it may serve to convince him and his colleagues, that it is extremely silly to maintain, because we cannot account for any particular circumstance, that it must necessarily be inexplicable."

OUT AT ELBOWS.

SOME people are always out at elbows. Give them to-day a new coat made of the thickest broadcloth, and sewed with the stoutest thread, and to-morrow there will be a hole, with the protruding ulna thrusting itself into public notice as usual. No amount of broadcloth will keep their elbows decent; and you may stitch up all the chasms of the Alps sooner than you can keep their seams together; the man, or the woman born out at elbows will die out at elbows, and though their friends spend their lives in darning over the rents, the darns will be only Penelope's webs at the best, and the night will undo what the day has wrought. As well might you try to fill Chat Moss with garden-mould shovelled in by spadesful as to knit up certain lives into good order and a tolerable sufficiency: you may give money, help, advice, example, till you are weary—you may go to unheard-of trouble to get this presentation and that office—you may do a little bit of jobbery and a great deal of nepotism, some bribery and more cajolery, to have them settled and comfortably clad and provided for. It is all to no good. Seams will still unrip and elbows still protrude. These persons are destined by an inexorable fate and an unlucky constitution to be always in tatters.

By no means absolute to poverty is out-at-elbowism; for poverty has often a scrupulous regard for rents and seams. Go into a house where elbows are out—no matter what the means, no matter how they may be sought to be hidden—there they are, obtrusive, denuded, dominant. Whatever the wealth in such a house, there will be the elbows—thrust into your face at every turn. Dine at this house: the dinner of rich meats will be served on a soiled, perhaps a tattered, tablecloth; the massive silver forks will be tarnished; the service will be fragmentary; the organization incomplete; some want will be sure to be seen in every corner, and elbows, naked, red and pointed, where should have been a fluting of velvet or an eider-down cushion. Magnificent furniture, which the housemaid does not consider is in her wages to dust; large rooms with grand ceilings, and the stifled atmosphere of a house never thoroughly cleansed and never thoroughly opened; gorgeous apparel costing many sums, but a purple cap-string floating on a blue bosom, or—my dear madam, what is that dark shade I see just below your chin? It contrasts a little awkwardly with the brilliants below and the point-lace above; and do you not think it would be as well to employ the chemistry of Brown Windsor, and the dynamics of a Baden towel, to try and remove its unpleasant suggestions? That is a form of protruding elbowism not infrequently seen with certain people not to the manner of close seams and perfect material born—is, indeed, rather an emblem and ensign of the small beginnings which never thought it worth while to learn the fit assignment of great endings.

There is the out-at-elbow look of the shut-up house where everything seems afraid of the daylight; and the out-at-elbow look of the breezy house—the house which always has all its doors and windows open, with never a chimney corner from garret to basement, whose inhabitants are amphibious and catarrh proof, and where a headache is a misdemeanor, and chilliness but a shade lighter than immorality. A charming place to stay at, but as little home to the four walls and window-loving Englishman as a tent on a mountain-top, or one's mattress spread in an eastern khan: perhaps as healthy and as free as both, or either, but not a whit cozier—a perforated life, with ventilating holes bored in every hat crown and rents at every elbow point—free and easy and healthful and breezy, and all that, but wanting knitting up, and stitching together and putting into shape; wanting, in fact, its elbows covered up in duffel and a comforter about its neck.

Then there is the out-at-elbow look of the untidy middle-class house, where domestic refinement is an exotic not grown, and with no seed-bed. This is the house where the ladies are for ever found in a state of unpreparedness and disorder; the drawing-room littered with stockings to mend and flannel petticoats to make; the hearth unswept: the luncheon crumbs upon the floor; and my lady and her daughters muffled up in old shawls and comfortable but unlovely jackets, generally with colds in their heads (untidy people are often afflicted with catarrh,) and always dreadfully busy, and dreadfully ashamed.

As a race, artists are of the out-at-elbow class: for the most part jagged and unordered, disconnected and in fragments; as if life was a series of patchwork, no matter whether held together or no, so long as each part is complete in itself. What does it signify if but the hexagon is true whether it is stitched into a counterpane, good against the cold on winter nights, or left loose in a box of odds and ends? The beauty of a part, not the fitness of the whole, is what most artists crave; and if a bit of scarlet is wanted in the right hand corner—why, paint that protruding elbow scarlet, and let the dull critics abuse you if they will for unfitness and misuse. What matters? you have your bit of scarlet in the right-hand corner, and your soul rests and is satisfied.

Authors are sad sinners in this direction: that is, as a class; for there are illustrious exceptions. There are officers of literature who are as punctual and rational as other men of business; men who can keep their books and attend to their accounts—places where proofs issue clean and to their time, where things are put straight when they go awry, and where dust, crooked lines, and topsiturniness generally, would be official misdemeanors met with a severity not to be lightly encountered. I know such an office as this of my own experience: and a pleasant office it is too, for business and other matters. I also know an artist's studio—the Italianized word is dying out, and study is taking its place—which does not smell of stale cigars, where the painter looks like a Christian and not like a wild man of the woods lately dressed in Holy-street, and where Clytie and the Milo Venus are in their natural colors and not grimed an inch thick with dust; and, by-the-by, why should artists' casts always be so grimed? Is there an artistic value in the deepened shadow, and more pronounced lines, which is of ever so much greater worth than the snobbish good of cleanliness and Mary's duster?

An artist's life is a strange out-at-elbowy kind of existence altogether. The ideal artist of a certain school knows nothing either of the two and two, or of the final disappearance of the eaten cake. He has been slow to learn the worth of common sense indeed in most things; slow to learn the value of well-clothed elbows—slower than any other class undoubtedly; but he is rationalizing now, darning up his rents, and stitching together his seams, and putting in both patches and padding, as is needful to a working world; specially against the knees and elbows. Privileged classes are fast becoming an anachronism: and swept away with the rest, happily, is the privileged out-at-elbowism of the artist world.

It is very sad to watch the gradual falling into out-at-elbowism of things new and bright and lovely; the gradual decay and disintegration of what once looked as solid as granite, and as durable as the everlasting hills. For things, as well as people, get out at elbows; and time wears holes in feelings as well as in velvet and corduroy. Love and hope and happiness and aspiration all go threadbare, and fall into rents as the months pass on and winter frosts wither up and blight the last of the summer flowers. In the youth and heyday of our life our moral elbows are covered an inch thick with generous padding; and we scout as sacrilege the idea that we shall ever go ragged, whatever happens to our neighbors. Impossible that we, burning fiery hot with poetry and zeal, should ever calm down into prose and vulgar fractions—that our philanthropic designs for regenerating mankind should subside into trading on our neighbors' necessities—that our poetic flights into the regions of the beautiful and the true should end in the Icarian sea of the useful and the expedient.

Look at the wedding coat, and the wedding gown too, for the matter of that. Bright, new, glossy, stainless, intact, do they not look as if fashioned for a lifetime? as if their brightness never could fade? their gloss be never rubbed away? their wholeness never broken? And yet what is the truth of that wedding wardrobe? In many cases out-at-elbowism before the year is fulfilled; in some before the wedding feast is cold; in almost all before life is ended; in only a gracious few, so few that we can all count up on our fingers the rare examples known to us, the seams kept close and the nap unrubbed to the last, and the gloss and the beauty and the wholeness the same in the end as was in the beginning. Only a few gracious instances of this preservation of the wedding garment known to any of us; but scores of those in which there are threadbare places, and jagged holes, and elbows all abroad, and premature dilapidation, and bitter repentance for the special pattern accepted—others so much more suited, maybe, rejected!—and enduring irritation with the "fit." Enduring indeed, oftentimes to the life's end. And when elbows once get adrift from the padding and close stitching of the wedding garments, I doubt if any amount of darning and fine drawing can re-cover them before they get swathed for everlasting in the shroud. You may darn up any other hole but this; bankruptcy, insolvency, even a hole in your good name, a hole in your heart, and the doctors say one in your head, friendship out of order (though this is difficult,) habits out at elbows (and this is difficult too,) anything, in short, may be mended and restored—but when once the wedding coat gets threadbare, and the bride's white satin soiled, and the state of conjugal out-at-elbowism sets in, bid good-by to needle and thread, for there will be no darning of those rents, and no restoring of those stains!

How terribly lives get out at elbows sometimes! Once off the rails is, with some people, to be always with their elbows in the mud, trying vainly to work their way back to the tram-road of success again. Shabby, ill-found, hopeless, desperate—will those ragged elbows ever get themselves cleansed from the mire and decently clothed in honest broadcloth again? In some cases certainly not, where fate and nature have predestined: in others, mayhap, yes; but out-at-elbowism is more often a permanent institution, than a temporary disease, and seams once unripped are not so easily restitched. Very bad is this state when it comes to a man on the lower half of the great highway; when the energy and hope of youth are dimmed, and the shadows are lengthening in the evening sunset. It is very rare when a man can patch up his elbow-rents after fifty; for once in tatters always in tatters, according to some, and it is difficult to convince the hard-headed that elbows now naked can ever clothe themselves in decent array again. Strong, too, is the clothed man's instinct against denuded elbows—strong as the horror of the plump ortolan when the lean snake fixes on him the charmed eye which presages a transfer of adipose tissue. Denuded elbows, like lean snakes, have little shame and no mercy. The natural man protruding through the artificial covering of conventional tailordom demands boldly his natural inheritance, and, never stopping to ask how your porridge-pot is filled or if you have supper enough left for yourself, undauntedly thrusts his elbow in your face, and claims a share of the beer he has not brewed and of the bread he has not baked. But then, he is naked and hungry; and can we wonder?

There are two sides to everything; and though all manner of help and kindness and generosity and patching up of our neighbor's ragged elbows—taking our own coat if need be, for the tailoring of mercy—is of the pure law of God in the dealings of man with his fellows, yet there is also a good in the sturdy appreciation of self-help and independence, which may (it has this dangerous tendency, I admit,) run into hardness and want of charity towards the troubles which a little sympathy could avert, and a little timely help tide over into the current of success again. Still, turning the thing round once more, it is a truth, though sorrowful and humiliating, that if there was always a tailor for every hole, elbows would be perpetually unripping without ever an attempt at self-darning, sure that some one would be found to take that labor on himself, and rig up the luckless ragamuffin as good as new again, and at his own cost. And it is a question whether the loveliness of universal charity would compensate for the ugliness of chronic out-at-elbowism content to be pauperized, to be fed with food it has not earned, and to live on labor it will not share. After all, a man's elbows are his own; and when they do get denuded it is his duty, and none other's, to re-cover them decently and to patch up the holes discreetly. —All the Year Round.

MRS. PARTINGTON ON THE WAR.—This famous lady thus addresses the Boston Gazette: "Perhaps you don't know Isaac has gone to the contented field; he was grafted last fall in one of the wings of the army, I suppose the flying artillery. I wrote to Mr. Stanton telling him not to put Isaac where he would get shot, as he wasn't used to it. I know what influenza you must have with the President, and I write this to you to get Isaac on a furlong, so he can get his mended pantaloon, for he writes me two of their 'parrots' burst their breeches, and I think what an awful thing it would be if Isaac was a parrot. When Isaac used to sing, 'I want to be an angel,' I did not think he would so soon be with 'the swamp angels' down in Charleston. He says the war will be over soon, and he will come back a Victoria. I'm sure I wish it was over now, or hadn't commenced yet."

No writer who deserves to succeed and who has faith in himself, is likely to suffer much, in the long run, by adverse criticism. Bentley uttered but the simple truth when he said: "No man was ever written down but by himself."

SAN FRANCISCO, SATURDAY, MAY 13, 1865.

THE NICHOLSON PAVEMENT.

THE man whose buggy wheels first strike the Nicholson pavement on Montgomery street does not allow any consideration of expense or durability to qualify his fullest praise. The noiseless roll of his vehicle and its even motion, the soothing, half-muffled beat of his horse's hoofs touch his sensibilities in a way that he cannot withstand. It seems a pity that there should be any appeal from this instinctive verdict. Unfortunately, this prima facie evidence of excellence is enough to excite suspicion in a good many people, to whom elegance and ease are believed to be incompatible with strength and utility, and who would be more apt to place confidence in the strength of a pavement that thoroughly bruised them than the one over which they rode with pleasure and security. Numberless old ladies are still to be found who prefer stone bridges, and could not be made to cross the new tubular structures. Many good people still wear rough clothes, imagining that they outlast the finest broadcloth. The religion of a large class of mankind is formed on the hypothesis that ugliness is wholesome, and discomfort dutiful, that skepticism and infidelity are somehow connected with spring mattresses and easy chairs, and that the world is destined in some mysterious manner to lapse into righteousness by a return to barbaric customs.

But the pavement is as strong as it is elegant. If the question of durability were confined to the experiment in this city, the burden of proof would of course fall upon the Nicholson party, and, with the usual fate of inventors, it would be difficult for them to prove the permanency and durability of a novelty. But the evidence shows that this pavement has been laid for nine years in Chicago, and during that time has worn down only but three-fourths of an inch. The Mayor, City Surveyor and Controller of Milwaukee, say "the question as to its durability, economy and beneficial effect upon the streets paved with it have been so satisfactorily settled in its favor, and the pavement is now held in such esteem, that when the subject of paving a street is being agitated the Nicholson is the only kind spoken of." Again, the Common Council of New York recently appointed a corps of engineers to visit Chicago and report upon it, which they have done so favorably that Broadway is to be paved with the Nicholson during the present year. These Eastern testimonials are so cumulative and convincing, that we believe the only objection against accepting them here is that the peculiarities of our climate may affect the conditions under which the pavement was elsewhere so successful—an objection which has not yet been stated with force enough to pass beyond a mere suggestion. To offset this, we have the peculiar construction and component details of the invention, too well known to the public to need repetition here, which would seem calculated to meet any exigencies of climate.

To return to our original proposition, we trust that the instinctive verdict of every one who has used the Nicholson pavement will obtain as final, leaving the question of durability in the rear of neatness, beauty, elegance and comfort. Let us enjoy the luxury of thoroughly comfortable streets for a few years, even if it bring chaos and confusion at the end of that time. After us, a deluge of mud and general ruin, if necessary. Let us be satisfied, however, that whatever the climax may be, it cannot produce anything worse than our present condition. Let the City Government grant to footsore and travel-jolted San Franciscans surcease of suffering, if it only be for a few years, and, if needs be, let future taxpayers suffer. By that time some newer and more elegant pavement may be introduced, which would involve the necessity of change any way. But in the interval there seems to be no plan which as fully and generally meets the exigencies of the case, no relief so speedy and effectual, no improvement that will so surely benefit the city, as that afforded by the Nicholson pavement.

Gov. Low has appointed Thursday, June 1st, as a day of fasting, humiliation and prayer, in accordance with the proclamation of the President of the United States, issued in consequence of the "untimely death of him who was the friend and guardian of the nation."

WANTED—A PARK.

THE few warm days of last week, which interrupted the usual shrill asperities of our San Francisco summer, would have suggested to any but San Franciscans the advantage of possessing some other breathing place than those few barren squares which the city has so generously set aside for their recreation. Our citizens have trusted so much to the sanitary qualities of the winds which half-yearly blow them off their feet and fill their eyes with sand, as to believe themselves exempt from the ordinary hygienic conditions of other growing cities. They have argued that the sterility of the soil prevented any cultivation without extravagant outlay, and have urged, with some show of reason, that owing to the peculiarities of climate there were but few hours of a summer's day when a park could be used comfortably as a means of recreation. They would be apt to see, in any attempt to purchase land for such a purpose, only the schemes of speculators and land-jobbers, and would plead outstanding debts and an exhausted treasury against any civic or legislative appropriation.

But these arguments are by no means infallible. The sanitary winds that sweep away miasma and noisome exhalations are not always to be depended upon, and the experience of the last few years has shown us that even this climate is subject to extreme capriciousness. And, admitting that these tonic breezes are perpetual, it is possible to profit by their curative properties without experiencing their discomforts, and we think a public park might be so sheltered by shrubbery as to temper those winds, which in a milder form are elsewhere appreciated. The vigor and luxuriance of private gardens in the very heart of the city would seem to disprove the arguments of sterility, and Mr. Sanford's experiment in the Custom House grounds shows with what ease and expedition public grounds may be decorated. With a large park, properly shielded from the violence of the winds, the conditions of another objection would be altered, and people might possess one locality where they might gather when dust is whirled through the city thoroughfares and the streets are almost impassable to promenaders. The final objection, that in purchasing grounds for this object more or less contract-jobbing would ensue, has some weight; but as THE CALIFORNIAN has nobody's private purpose to serve, and no particular locality to advocate, it may venture to urge with entire disinterestedness some principles to be taken into consideration in the selection of a situation.

The park should be liberal in size, and suited to the growing requirements of our metropolis. Squares of the same area as those set apart in this city have been long discarded as inadequate for most cities of any pretension. One hundred acres, at least, are wanted. Its locality should be selected with an eye to our future limits, far enough removed from the present business centre to obtain perfect freedom and reticacy, and yet near enough to be accessible to pedestrians. That fertile area, now covered by market gardens and nurseries, lying east and south of the Mission Dolores, would comprise these advantages, with arable land and diversified surface. The grounds might be laid out in a style corresponding with the New York Central Park, containing the usual "drives," "rambles," "ponds," and "rustic bridges." Dwarf-oaks and willows—the only umbrageous products of San Francisco—are within this fertile zone, and would suffice until cultivation could produce something better. A greater portion of this locality has been under tillage for the past ten years, and the improvements, if they enhanced its value, would also save a good deal of the expense of preparing waste and barren sand hills. Or, should the design we have imperfectly sketched above be too ambitious for consideration at present, another plan may be suggested. Grounds, suitably shaded, might be purchased in the southern portion of the city, fronting the bay, and protected by a sea wall, affording a promenade something like the Battery of New York in its palmiest days, which, while combining the advantages of a sea view and fresh air, would be less exposed to the violence of the winds than North Beach or Meigs' Wharf. The multitudes which on Sundays and holidays flock to these latter places is a presumptive proof of the popularity which would be accorded to a more secure and comfortable place of resort.

As mere suggestions, these plans are open to much modification. Either or both may be adopted or supplanted by some other project of equal benefit; but it seems to us all-essential for the comfort, health and reputation of the city that its facilities for public recreation, by some such means as we have shown, should be greatly increased. The few suburban places of resort that we possess, the Willows, the Cliff House and Thorpe's, are at expensive distances, and not always readily accessible to men of moderate means and large families—to say nothing of the bibulous atmosphere which slightly dims their glory. Business men have already admitted the necessity of some recreation for their hard-worked employes by granting them a half-holiday on Saturday afternoons. It should be the privilege of the city to grant them some healthful place where they can rationally and beneficially enjoy their leisure. With improved sanitary conditions, better morality and higher tastes among her citizens, the city would be amply repaid for any outlay for the object we have solicited.

MUSICAL MATTERS.

"TROVATORE" was repeated on Saturday evening at Maguire's Academy of Music. Miss Phillips' "Azucena" was, as usual, pre-eminently good; if the tenor would pretermitt some of his remarkable embellishments he would please better. Verdi's original score of this opera has always appeared to us to be tolerable enough for San Francisco, but we may be mistaken. Lucrezia Borgia on Tuesday evening was well sung—Miss Phillips' pure contralto in the famous brindisi seemed to melt, like Cleopatra's pearl, in the cnp. Lucia di Lammermoor was given on Thursday night. The duet of the tenor and soprano, at the end of Act 1st was very cleverly executed, and the two actors were called before the curtain. The quintette, in the second act was deservedly encoored. We are glad to state that Lucrezia Borgia will be given to night out of regard to the wishes of the admirers of Miss Phillips, who fills so capitably the role of "Maffio Orsini." On Tuesday Rigoletto will be produced, and on Thursday, Ernani.

Lucia di Lammermoor was also performed at the Metropolitan Theatre on Wednesday evening. The audience were not large in numbers but were powerful in expression and demonstrative to a superlative degree. Perhaps something of partisan rivalry mingles slightly with the musical enthusiasm of our opera-goers. The acting of this opera was very spirited, and the finale in the second act, the duet of the baritone and tenor in the third act, and the closing finale were warmly commended. Ernani was given last evening.

A full attendance greeted Gottschalk at the Academy of Music on Wednesday night. His reputation as a pianist is national, his works as a composer are household words, and his style, ably analysed by the best musical authorities, is so well known that further description would seem superfluous. None but a musician could fairly criticise his genius, and simple praise gives no idea of his ability. The visible manipulation, and the lightning-like play of his fingers, made his performance something extraordinary as a spectacle. In the "Eolian Murnurs" his delicacy was especially shown; under his marvellous touch the faintest musical tremor seemed to rise and swell into a volume of sound, hardly conceivable as the ordinary compass of his instrument. Possessed of so much artistic taste and genius, it seems strange that he does not give a more decided preference to classical music in his selections.

Of this manual dexterity, the Bulletin says: "We see a piece of minute and yet most powerful machinery remorselessly attacking the key board—there is no pause, no indecision. Like the 'devil' in a cotton factory, his fingers clutch the raw material—the undeveloped sounds that lurk in the quiescent instrument—and tear from them the delicate fibres of melody, which he draws, twists and combines into most exquisite harmonies."

Miss Simons, possessed of a high but somewhat thin soprano voice, was warmly applauded on her debut. Her execution is brilliant and remarkable, her style exceedingly artistic, and only marred by a tendency to overload with ornament, which, in the first part of her song from the Child of the Regiment, seemed rather distasteful to the ear. A violin solo by Schmidt, and two songs by Mr. Leach, very creditable to those gentlemen, made up the programme.

Gottschalk will give a "Matinée" this afternoon at the Academy. A superior programme is offered.

U. S. GOVERNMENT LOAN. — A telegram from Philadelphia of May 7th says that the 7-30 Loan, during the last six days, amounted to over forty millions. On the 9th, over fifteen millions were subscribed, one New York banking house taking five millions. About four millions of these bonds are now on their way to this State, and Mr. Cooke, of Jay Cooke & Co., is here to assist in perfectly placing them before the people. It is to be hoped that Californians will not show themselves behind their eastern brethren in this practical display of confidence in the Government and its institutions, even if the interest does not approach the height of some of the California rates. Four millions is a small amount for the capital California represents. The Secretary of the Treasury would be justified in looking with skeptical eyes on our prosperity and financial ability, as well as questioning the disinterestedness of our patriotism, if we, who yearly swamp capital in wild-cat stocks and hair-brained speculations, permit this Loan of the Government to go begging, or fall far behind eastern capitalists in our subscriptions.

Those of our readers who have become interested in "Only a Clod," must necessarily be disappointed this week. The advance sheets of the serial from which we obtain the story as its publication progresses, did not arrive by last steamer. Next week we will have an ample supply, and the various characters in this charming novel will move on "as though nothing had happened."

We have received from A. Roman & Co., 417 and 419 Montgomery street, the following books to late for review this week: Social Statics, Emerson's Poems, Thoreau's Cape Cod, Lorrimer Littlegood and Trial of John Y. Beall.

FURTHER OF MR. MARK TWAIN'S IMPORTANT CORRESPONDENCE.

I PROMISED, last week, that I would publish in the present number of THE CALIFORNIAN the correspondence held between myself and Rev. Phillips Brooks of Philadelphia, and Rev. Dr. Cummings of Chicago, but I must now beg you to release me from that promise. I have just received telegrams from these distinguished clergymen suggesting the impolicy of printing their letters; the suggestion is accompanied by arguments so able, so pointed and so conclusive that, although I saw no impropriety in it before, I am forced now to concede that it would be very impolitic to publish their letters. It could do but little good, perhaps, and might really do harm, in awakening a diseased curiosity in the public mind concerning the private matters of ministers of the gospel. The telegrams and accompanying arguments are as follows:

FROM REV. PHILLIPS BROOKS.

PHILADELPHIA, Friday, May 12.

MR. MARK TWAIN: * Am told you have published Bishop Hawks' letter. You'll ruin the clergy! Don't—don't publish mine. Listen to reason—come, now, don't make an ass of yourself. Draw on me for five hundred dollars.

REV. PHILLIPS BROOKS.

[Although I feel it my duty to suppress his letter, it is proper to state for the information of the public, that Phil. gets a higher salary where he is, and consequently he cannot come out here and take charge of Grace Cathedral. Mem.—He is in petroleum to some extent, also.—M. T.]

FROM REV. DR. CUMMINGS.

CHICAGO, Thursday, May 11.

MR. MACSWAIN: * Have you really been stupid enough to publish Bishop Hawks' letter? Ge-whillikins! don't publish mine. Don't be a fool, Mike.* Draw on me for five or six hundred.

REV. DR. CUMMINGS.

[I am conscious that it would be improper to print the Doctor's letter, but it may be as well to observe that he also gets a higher salary where he is, and consequently he cannot come out here and take charge of Grace Cathedral. Mem.—He is speculating a little in grain.—M. T.]

I am afraid I was rather hasty in publishing Bishop Hawks' letter. I am sorry I did it. I suppose there is no chance now to get an Argument out of him, this late in the day.

FOREIGN CORRESPONDENCE.

I am a suffering victim of my infernal disposition to be always trying to oblige somebody without being asked to do it. Nobody asked me to help the vestry of Grace Cathedral to hire a minister; I dashed into it on my own hook, in a spirit of absurd enthusiasm, and a nice mess I have made of it. I have not succeeded in securing either of the three clergymen I wanted, but that is not the worst of it—I have brought such a swarm of low-priced back-country preachers about my ears that I begin to be a little appalled at the work of my own hands. I am afraid I have evoked a spirit that I cannot lay. A single specimen of the forty-eight letters addressed to me from the interior will suffice to show the interest my late publication has excited:

FROM REV. MR. BROWN.

GRASSHOPPER CHATEAU, 1865.

BRO. TWAIN: I feel that the opportunity has arrived at last for me to make a return somewhat in kind for the countless blessings which have been poured—poured, as it were—upon my unworthy head. If you get the vacancy in Grace Cathedral for me, I will accept of it at once, and at any price, notwithstanding I should sacrifice so much here in a worldly point of view, and entail so much unhappiness upon my loving flock by so doing—for I feel that I am "called," and it is not for me, an humble instrument, to disobey. [The splotch you observe here is a tear.] It stirs the deepest emotions in my breast to think that I shall soon leave my beloved flock: bear with this seeming childishness, my friend, for I have reared this dear flock, and tended it for years, and I fed it with spiritual food, and sheared it—ah, me, and sheared it—I cannot go on—the subject is too harrowing. But I'll take that berth for less than any mau on the continent, if you'll get it for me. I send you specimen sermons—some original and some selected and worked over. * * *

Your humble and obedient servant,
T. ST. MATTHEW BROWN.

They all want the berth at Grace Cathedral. They would all be perfectly satisfied with $7,000 a year. They are all willing to sacrifice their dearest worldly interests and break the tenderest ties that bind them to their rural homes, to come and fight the good fight in our stately church. They all feel that they could do more good and serve their master better in a wider sphere of action. They all feel stirring within them souls too vast for confinement in narrow flats and gulches. And they all want to come here and spread. And worse than all, they all devil me with their bosh, and send me their sermons to read, and come and dump their baggage in my hall, and take possession of my bed-rooms by assault, and carry my dinner-table by storm, instead of inflicting these miseries upon the vestry of Grace Cathedral, who are the proper victims, by virtue of their office. Why in thunder do they come harassing me? What have I got to do with the matter? Why, I do not even belong to the church, and have got no more to do with hiring pastors for it than the Dey of Algiers has. I wish they would ease up a little on me; I mixed into this business a little too brashly—so to speak—and without due reflection; but if I get out of it once all right, I'll not mix in any more—never any more; now that's honest—I never will.

I have numerous servants, but they are all worked down. My housekeeper is on the verge of open rebellion. Yesterday she said: "I lay I'll take and hyste some of them preachers out of this mighty soon, now." And she'll do it. I shall regret it. I could entertain no sentiment but that of regret to see a clergyman "hysted" out of my establishment, but what am I to do? I cannot help it. If I were to interfere I should get "hysted" myself.

My clerical guests are healthy. Their appetites are good. They are not particular as to food. They worry along very well on spring chickens. I don't feel safe with them, though, because if it is considered that a steamboat on the Mississippi is inviting disaster when she ventures to carry more than two ministers at a time, isn't it likely that the dozen I have got in my house will eventually produce an earthquake? The tradition goes that three clergymen on a steamboat will ground her, four will sink her, and five and a gray mare added will blow her up. If I had a gray mare in my stable, I would leave this city before night.

MARK TWAIN.

*Excuse the unhappy telegraph—it never spells names right.—M. T.

(For the Californian.)

A FEW OPERATIC CRITICISMS.

I WOULD state at the beginning of this article that I am not an opera critic, and do not wish to be confounded with any of those amiable gentlemen who write the regular notices, whose facile handling of musical terms always impresses me, and who, with their other varied talents seem to be gifted with a prescience which not unfrequently enables them to pen a fair description of a performance before it has taken place. But I deem it only just to these gentlemen to say that their criticisms partake of all the vagueness and obscurity of the prophetic statement, are susceptible of a variety of meanings, and convey a certain impressiveness which a careful analysis fails to substantiate.

My object being to ask rather than give information, to make suggestions rather than statements, I find myself at this point somewhat embarrassed by my style, which has in the first paragraph unwittingly assumed something of the didactic and critical quality I have deprecated. Writing purely from a sense of ignorance I find myself unconsciously in that oracular attitude which any excess of this quality is apt to produce. To come to the point from which I have been straying, I should like to proponnd a few questions.

Why are baritones—with the exception of "Don Giovanni," "Plunkett" and a few others—always either unsuccessful in love or inimical to its expression? Why are they invariably jilted lovers, cruel parents or hated elder brothers? Is there anything in their quality of voice which precludes a perfect illustration of reciprocal passion? Believing this arbitrary rule would fail in real life, it has occurred to me that it might be an interesting experiment for the tenor and baritone to sometimes change places. But then, it has also occurred to me that the tenor, owing to what I conceive to be his natural weakness, would fail completely; his vindictiveness would be apt to be feminine and hysterical, his malice would be inconceivably shrill, and would naturally take small methods of expression; instead of using the dagger he would probably pinch the soprano and call the baritone bad names. His passion is of a quality so evidently made to be appreciated—his existence is so peculiarly dependent upon the soprano who is the female of his species, that I shudder to think of his conduct under any of those conditions which bring out the baritone so splendidly. As the tenor voice expresses the highest musical standard of masculine perfection, I have sometimes wondered if the weaknesses I have described were not incidental to other qualities of perfection. But I fear that I am wandering from the subject at this point, and pass on to the next question.

Why are the chorus always so unanimous in their expressions of sympathy? Would not some slight diversity of opinion, or a little independence of character on the part of one or two, be an agreeable relief, besides throwing a little more sincerity into their condolence or congratulations? But I have noticed that in spite of this apparent sympathy for the principal actor, they invariably ignore each other's acquaintance on the stage, and stand apart even while uttering a sentiment in which they all concur. Their relations are so evidently to the baritone or tenor, and so little to each other, that if I were a composer I should consider it my duty to write an opera that should be all chorus, just to throw these gentlemen back upon themselves and develop their individuality. They are so utterly dependent upon the principal characters for their ideas, and sometimes even for their language, that the spectacle often becomes humiliating to the sensitive man, and I can readily imagine that a continued habit of chorus singing is dreadfully shattering to character. I am not prepared to say that their peculiarities are unreal, or their conduct unnatural. On the contrary, I have met in this real world one or two distinguished men who seem to have been attended through life by just such sympathizing choruses. Like these operatic brethren, this worldly chorus have neither reciprocity nor individuality; they are not warmed by the sentiments they echo, and if the actor to whom they are related is removed they have nothing to do but transfer their relations to some other. Born to the chorus they never rise in their profession—but feeling that I am guilty of a certain complicity with T. S. Arthur and Miss Braddon in the construction of this moral, I leave the sentence unfinished.

Why does the vernacular in English Opera—particularly in recitative—always affect us unpleasantly, irrespective of its musical infelicity? Perhaps we instinctively acknowledge a certain discord between our real sentiments and expression and the delightful shams and tinselled rhetoric set up before us. I have noticed that as long as the language of the libretto is confined to the French and Italian idioms, we seldom trouble ourselves about its morality or truthfulness to Nature, and rather believe that the responsibility in some way devolves on those nations in whose language the opera is written. The scrupulous sentiment of Camille, so unbearable in the dialogue of the English play, is altogether changed in the delicious music and "soft bastard Latin" of Traviata. For these reasons I am inclined to believe that those barbarians who decry Italian opera because they cannot understand the language, are not as honest as they would have us think. What business have they to want to understand it? Why should they drag the prosaic utterances of their every day life into the region of romance and poetry?

But the philosopher who analyses his pleasures loses half his enjoyment, and the gods destroy those who scrutinize their gifts. Wherefore, O reader, let you and I proceed quietly to the temple of enchantment, in which a questioning word or doubt dissolves the charm. Let us look cheerfully upon this brilliant assembly, and the lovely creatures attired in that charming full dress in which, alas, so few of the real heroic duties of womanly life are performed. The curtain rises. Smile not, scoffer, because the silver moon, which ascends with such alarming rapidity over the Druid groves, is several times larger than the one with which thou art familiarly acquainted. Pretermit the jest which rises to thy lips at the imperial which the stoutest Druid, who is unfamiliar with early English history, sports upon his chin. Question not the theology of the Priestess, for the rippling curls of the lady before thee are false, the diamond that glitters on the bosom of yonder snob is paste. We are such stuff as operas are made of, and our little life is rounded by the fall of the green curtain.

BRET.

WHAT THE ENGLISH JOURNALS WILL SAY.—Those English journals which have generously espoused the weaker, and, as it seemed to them, romantic and chivalrous side of our National struggle, would seem to be just now entitled to our especial sympathy. It was comparatively easy for them to gloss over the taking of Richmond, and find some compensation therefor in the terms which Johnston extracted from Sherman. The flight of Jefferson Davis they might have excused, for even Kings have sometimes preferred that method to the old heroic fashion of dying on the battle-field. But the spectacle of the exalted head of the Confederacy placarded through the country as a felon and the cowardly accomplice of an assassin—liable to arrest in any civilized community for a common crime against society—is something that exceeds most of the conditions of romance. Perhaps, however, that poetry which clothed with an heroic atmosphere the chronometer-thief and pirate Semmes, would have no difficulty in glorifying the assassin Davis. But our English cousins do not stand in need of sympathy. That sublime conceit which enwraps them like the fog of their own dear metropolis, if it clouds their perception of surrounding objects, conceals their own persons from the searching shafts of ridicule. So, whether they offer an asylum to the outlaw, should he escape, and smother him with sympathizing resolutions, or with consistent inconsistency suddenly wheel about and lampoon him in Punch, we have no fears but that English journalists will do what will seem in their own eyes eminently wise, just and proper under the circumstances.

C. B. MILLER, at his Floral Repository, No. 200 Bush street, opposite the Cosmopolitan Hotel, has a rare and beautiful Cactus now in bloom. The flower is about nine inches in length, and of the most beautiful pink color, mottled with white. It is called the Echinocactus Eyresii, from echinos, a hedge-hog, and cactus, a name given by Theophrastus to a spring plant. These plants are of great beauty and interest on account of their singular and grotesque appearance, the arrangement of their spines and the beauty of their flowers. The plant referred to is from South America.

A LADY in Sacramento, recently, after partaking of rhubarb pie, became suddenly and violently ill. Upon investigation, it was found that the rhubarb had been cooked in a copper vessel, and the acid acting on the metal had produced verdigris. Prompt medical treatment relieved the lady from the danger to which carelessness had subjected her.

A THRILLING NOVEL BY "McARONE."

CHAPTER I.

IT was a night of August, 1804, that a gray-haired and respectable lieutenant of the Irish navy sat in the fore-chains of the frigate Sunburst, keeping watch.

The vessel lay in the harbor of Havana, but the city lights were almost hidden by the snow and sleet that drove thick upon the pitiless blast, and the thunderous crash and crackle of the ice against the sterile Cuban beach.

Day at last broke upon the dismal scene. The aged lieutenant arose from the forechains, shut up his telescope, blew out the binnacle lights, and called: "Watch, watch, watch!"

The Dog Watch came, and the wearied officer retired to his cabin to refresh himself with slumber.

Ah, little did he know of what was about to befall him in the next chapter.

CHAPTER II.

During his sleep he died... cruelly murdered.

The same hand that slew him then fired the goodly ship.

She was soon a sheet of flame, went on her beam-ends, burst her boiler, burned to low-water mark, and sunk. Vessel and cargo a total loss. Insurance unknown.

Turn we to other scenes.

CHAPTER III.

A gentleman of wealth and distinction, living near Patchogue, L. I., was walking up and down his apartments, clad in a splendid dressing-gown of gold brocade, and slippers of sheep's fur. He passed his jewelled fingers through the curls that clustered about his lily-white brow, and murmured convulsively:

"I am the guardian of the Lady Eveleen. Her father was murdered. I had charge of her splendid fortune. I have lost it at draw-poker. I now intend to marry her, in order to conceal the loss. This is the dreadful mystery that embitters my life. Not a soul must know it. That's why I speak of it now alone, to myself."

At this moment, the door opened as if by magic... the usual custom of doors in romances... and a young man with auburn hair and a bull-terrier pup entered.

"Good morning, John," said he: "how are you now?"

"I am wretched, Adolphus," replied the other.

"You have, then, a secret sorrow?"

"I have. In vain I dance and sing to drive away dull care. I go a-fishing, and the fish don't bite; I seek nepentho on the road, but it's a hard road to travel; I hoe in the garden, but it's a hard row to hoe; I whistle at the plow, but the plow won't come. All is empty!"

Adolphus gazed at a black bottle that reposed on the étagère.

"It is!" he said, mysteriously.

"Now what would you advise me to do?" asked John.

"By my troth," responded his friend, "I should say that the charms of a hymeneal life might dissipate your gloom. The Lady Eveleen is more than passing fair, and is of age to wed. Why not fling your name and fortune at her fairy feet and bide the issue at her smiling lips. Good sooth indeed is meet to win a gladsome prize!"

He didn't know precisely what he meant by this last expression, but, like other characters in novels, thought he might say anything that sounded well.

"Adolphus," said John, "I will do it!"

The friends stood long in a silent embrace, with tears coursing down their noses, while the bull-terrier pup nipped the calves of their legs playfully.

CHAPTER IV.

The Lady Eveleen sat in a second-story bower with folding-doors. Vases of purple porphyry, gleamed darkly through the weird obscurity which fell from the dead sheen of crimson curtains, and a he bulbul, in a cage of golden filagree, sang mournful memories of the rose-gardens of sunny Labrador. A crystal chalice of pellucid water hung by the eage, and from it the bulbul occasionally sluiced his melodious gob.

"How are you, bulbul?" said the Lady Eveleen, archly.

And the bird, who had just heard of the fall of Richmond, cleared his throat, and, without apology, sang "Yankee Doodle." Hardly had the bulbul finished his exquisite strain, when the door of Eveleen's bower flew open, also as if by magic, and her guardian entered.

"Will you marry me?" said he.

"O, go way!" said she.

"Eveleen, I mean it," he went on, in a voice tremulous with passion; "I love you as no man ever loved no woman, and if you do not bid me hope, I shall be real mad."

"Sir," she said, "you flatter me by your preference, but I'd rather not."

"You love another!" he muttered hoarsely: "you know you do."

"You speak truly," she said, while a tender crimson like that of a young radish overspread her delicately-chiseled cheek; "I cannot give you a heart that is not mine. I... I have... a sort of sneaking notion... for... for Adolphus!"

"No! Pshaw!"

"I have!"

"'Tis hopeless. Even now he advised me to wed you."

"He did? Then it is, alas, too true! Woe is me!"

She then tore her hair, until her waterfall was in danger of coming off, when she desisted.

CHAPTER V.

A cold, stern-faced man stood on a bleak hillside watching the angry sunset. He was pale and careworn; one of those men whose faces you will remember, if you see them often enough. He walked slowly and thoughtfully up the hill, with an expression in his eyes like that of a man who seeks for nothing and finds it. At his heels waddled a fat bull-terrier pup, with pink eyes.

Ha! you have already guessed that this man is Adolphus!

The north-wind blew chill, and seemed to wail with a saddened voice. He wondered, with a vague unrest, whether, if the wind were conscious, it might not know things that he didn't know; and whether it were of any use to know things that the wind, if it were not conscious, couldn't know, and so forth. He thought all this, because he was that kind of a man. When he reached the top of the hill, he burst into tears.

"It cannot be!" he said; "she loves me, but how can I make her mine? Her guardian loves her to madness—be is my friend—honor forbids me to see her more. My lot is hard... ay, harder than hinges!"

He kicked his dog to conceal the emotion which unmanned him. Then he strode rapidly away, down the hill, and was lost to sight.

And the sun went on setting, just as before, in its couch of angry flaming clouds, and the wind wailed more sadly as the purple shadows of night crept up that now deserted hillside.

CHAPTER VI.

Lady Eveleen sat on the shore of the doubtful and mysterious ocean, and its waves chased each other playfully up, as if to kiss her fairy foot. (When I say foot, I mean feet; but we novelists consider the singular number more elegant, in such cases.)

All of a sudden, the fair girl continued to sit on the sands, gazing upon the briny deep, on whose heaving bosom the tall ships went merrily by, freighted, ah, who can tell with how much of joy and sorrow, and pine lumber, and emigrants, and hopes, and salt fish!

At this moment, a black shadow gradually fell athwart the tawny sands, and rested on the book which Eveleen held listless in her lap. She looked up, and started with affright. Her guardian stood before her.

"Alone here, Eveleen?" he murmured in low and musical tones, like the first tremulous notes of an accordeon touched by a master-hand.

"I am," she said.

"Once more," he added, murmuringly, "I ask you, will you ever be thus alone, or will you thread life's pleasant paths with me?"

She was about to reply in English, when she reflected that she had, thus far, used no French phrases, without which no romance can be complete now-a-days.

"Je vivrai seule," she said, with emphasis; "je le jure par le saint tissonnier de Moïse!"

"Consider well," he said; "you won't have many more chances."

"I don't want any more chances," replied she. "I tell you, once for all, that I will not wed with you!"

He scratched his head thoughtfully with his little finger.

"I am your guardian," said he at length; "I command you to marry me!"

She sprang to her feet, turned her large tobacco-colored eyes toward heaven, and placed her snowy hand on the jewelled hilt of a poignard such as heroines usually carry in their bosoms.

"One step nearer," she cried, "and we both perish by this highly-tempered and carefully-whetted blade! I scorn you! Death before dishonor! Hah, hah, ha—a—a!"

The wily monster recoiled in horror from the beautiful but wrathful phantom he had himself aroused. She seized the opportunity and flew to a boat which had been left, quite conveniently, on the shore; stepped in, took an oar, and paddled far out upon the raging billows.

"I guess I've rather got you now!" she shrieked; and laughed with cruel glee to see her guardian fall swooning upon the beach.

CHAPTER VII.

Penniless, desperate, a voluntary exile from her luxurious bome, the Lady Eveleen paddled her light bark manfully onward till she arrived in Liverpool. It there occurred to her that it was high time for her to succumb to the fact of her class, and to become a governess. She accordingly rang at the door of a palatial mansion in the most aristocratic portion of the city, and asked to see the lady of the house.

The servant showed her into a parlor where a middle-aged woman sat, magnificently dressed, reading a novel, and caressing a King Charles spaniel; the only two occupations of any lady who desires a governess.

"Do you wish," said Eveleen, stifling all feelings of pride (for she too could read a novel and caress a spaniel as well as the next woman), "do you wish, madame, to engage a governess?"

"No... I believe I don't want nobody just now," replied the lady.

"You should say, 'I don't want anybody,' madame," said Eveleen.

"Well, child," the lady said, looking up, "you seem to have a superior education. I'll engage you at once!"

CHAPTER VIII.

A year rolled by.

One morning, Eveleen went to a grocery to buy some herrings for lunch, and the grocer wrapped them in an old newspaper. On arriving at home, my heroine meditatively consumed her fish, and read scraps of news from the paper half unconsciously, till she came to this item:

AMERICAN DUPE.—The New York papers relate the story of a man named John, who had a young lady ward, whom he wished to marry. She confessed her love for a friend of his, named Adolphus, and fled to avoid her guardian's persecutions. Recently, John challenged Adolphus, and the two met at Hoboken, where, after exchanging seventy-nine shots each, without effect, Adolphus's pistol exploded, and blew his head off. John is missing.

Now most girls would have fainted, or ruptured a blood-vessel, or died of heart-disease, or gone into a rapid decline, on learning such news. But Eveleen was not of common clay, and moreover, I have promised to bring this story to a purely original end. I have had no difficulty with it, so far; having, in fact, written it with only one hand, as easy as smoking a pipe. Let me hasten to make a finish.

Eveleen, after reading the intelligence of Adolphus's death, quietly but sadly ate the last herring, and then, calling her youthful charges, went on being a governess, and made a very good one indeed!

SUPERIOR NONSENSE VERSES.

[The following is a clever imitation of a certain style of popular poetry much extant. Each verse is a non sequitur, and the concluding four lines, though apparently explanatory, give no clue to the meaning of the preceding stanzas:]

HE comes with herald clouds of dust;
Ecstatic frenzies rend his breast;
A moment, and he graced the earth—
Now, seek him at the eagle's nest.

Hark! seest thou not the torrent's flash
Far shooting o'er the mountain height?
Hear'st not the billows' solemn roar,
That echoes through the vaults of night?

Anon the murky cloud is riven,
The lightnings leap in sportive play,
And through the clanging doors of heaven,
In calm effulgence bursts the day.

Hope peering from her fleecy car,
Smiles welcome to the coming spring,
And birds with blithesome songs of praise
Make every grove and valley ring.

What though on pinions of the blast
The sea-gulls swing with leaden flight?
What though the watery caverns deep
Gleam ghostly on the wandering sight?

Is there no music in the trees
To charm thee with its frolic mirth?
Must Care's wan phantom still beguile
And chide thee to the stubborn earth?

Lo! Fancy from her magic realm
Pours Boreal gleams adown the pole.
The tidal currents lift and swell—
Dead currents of the ocean's soul.

Yet never may their mystic streams
Breathe whispers of the mournful past,
Or Pallas wake her sounding lyre
Mid Ether's columned temples vast.

Grave History walks again the earth
As erst it did in days of old,
When, seated on the golden throne,
Her hand a jewelled sceptre held.

The Delphic oracle is dumb,
Dread Cumea wafts no words of fate
To fright the eager souls that press
Through sullen Lethe's iron gate.

But deeper shadows gather o'er
The vales that sever night and morn;
And darkness folds with brooding wing
The rustling fields of waving corn.

Then issuing from his bosky lair
The crafty tiger crouches low,
Or thunders from the frozen north
The white bear, lapped in Arctic snow.

Thus shift the scenes till high aloft
The young moon sets her crescent horn,
And in gray evening's emerald sea
The heauteous Star of Love is born.

SOMEBODY has found out a new way of taking pictures, by which they can be taken better in the night than in the day-time. A Schenectady daguerreotypist has missed several from the frames that hang by his door, and doesn't approve of the new plan.

HOSTETTER'S CELEBRATED STOMACH BITTERS.

A TIMELY WARNING TO THE SICK.—It is especially important at this time, when the markets of the United States are flooded with the direst poisons, under the name of imported liquors, and when domestic compounds, purporting to be medicinal, but not a whit less pernicious, are heralded to the world as "sovereign remedies," that the public should fully understand the facts. Be it known, then, that while all the diffusive stimulants called liquors are impure, and all the Tonics containing alcohol are manufactured with a fiery article containing amyl or fusel oil, a mortal poison; HOSTETTER'S CELEBRATED STOMACH BITTERS contain none of these things, but are a combination of pure Essence of Rye with the pure juices of the most valuable stomachic, antibilious and aperient herbs and plants, and that as a safe and rapid remedy for Dyspepsia and all its kindred complaints, this preparation stands before the world without a rival or competitor. Its sales to-day are equal to the combined sales of all the other Tonics advertised in the United States, and the certificates which authenticate its usefulness are signed by individuals of the highest standing in every professional calling and walk of life. Beware of imitations and impostures.

FARRAND'S OSCILLATING Amalgamator.

THIS UNRIVALED IMPROVEMENT FOR THE REDUCTION and amalgamation of Gold and Silver Ores, is now running daily at No. 206 Commercial street, between Front and Davis.

THIS AMALGAMATOR INVOLVES

NO COMPLICATED MACHINERY

And possesses the following advantages over all others now in use:

1st It is capable of doing double the amount of work of the ordinary Pans, at a saving of more than one-half the power.

2d. It reduces the pulp finer, thereby producing a better result.

3d. It requires less quicksilver by one-half at a charge, whilst the loss by trituration is comparatively nothing.

4th. As an Amalgamator for gold contained in sulphurets, as also for very fine ore or flour gold, it has no equal.

5th. This Amalgamator involves no complicated machinery, and is less liable to get out of order than any of the pans.

DESCRIPTION OF FARRAND'S AMALGAMATOR.

In offering this Amalgamator to the public the inventor does not claim any new or scientific method of extracting the precious metals from the ores; he merely claims a new and simple combination of mechanical principles, whereby a great saving of power (full one-half in amount) is effected. The capacity of the machine varies with its size. The smallest, or prospecting size, will reduce 400 lbs. in three hours, and can be easily worked by the power of one man. The largest size will work 1,500 lbs. in three hours, or six tons in 24 hours, with an application of a trifle more than one-horse power. This saving of power, as all mill-men are aware, is an important consideration, particularly where fuel is scarce. The power so saved in running the Amalgamators may be advantageously employed to an increase of stamps, and thus proportionally increasing the work of the mill. This machine consists of a semi-cylindrical, trough-shaped vessel, in the interior of which is furnished with moveable concave dies, to be replaced when worn out, as in ordinary pans. The millers are convex, and attached to a substantial rock shaft, by which they are moved back and forward by crank or eccentric motion. The millers are held to their places by springs of moderate strength, the pressure of which may be easily regulated. The oscillating motion of the millers serves to keep the pulp in a constant state of agitation, thoroughly mixing it, and passing it under the millers without resort to any of the various expedients employed in Pans where a circular motion is maintained. The peculiar construction of this machine admits of its being worked with a much smaller charge of quicksilver, to any given amount of pulp than the flat-bottomed Pans. The spiral springs greatly assist in the work of reduction, by allowing the free admission of the pulp between the millers and dies, so that the pulp is made to actually work upon itself—as the dust of the diamond is made to reduce the gem itself. The advantage derived of thus avoiding all trituration in the presence of quicksilver, must be apparent to any one at all acquainted with gold or silver amalgamating.

Trials made with this machine in the presence of experts, during the last six months, have been pronounced highly satisfactory. It is peculiarly well adapted to employment by small mining operators in distant localities, as it can readily be taken to pieces and packed upon mules.

A large size machine is constructed without dies or millers, but simply with arms to act as stirrers, to be used in connection with several of the Amalgamators as a "Separator," as it is found that the peculiar motion given to these arms, in connection with the concave shape of the body of the machine, renders it most effectual for such a purpose.

I CHALLENGE COMPETITION.

THE WEEK'S DESPATCHES.

JEFF. DAVIS, Jacob Thompson, C. C. Clay, Beverly Tucker, George N. Saunders, W. C. Clevery and other prominent rebels and traitors, having been, it appears, directly implicated in the murder of the late President, the President of the United States offers a reward of $100,000 for the arrest of Davis, $25,000 each for Clay, Thompson and Tucker, and $10,000 for Clevery, late a clerk in Clay's employ.

Payne, the assassin of Seward, made a full confession of his guilt.

Dick Taylor, it is believed, has surrendered his forces to Gen. Canby.

The Hon. A. Burwell appeals by letter to his fellow-citizens of Mississippi to take the oath of allegiance.

An expedition against the guerrillas of Brownsville, Tennessee, was successful.

A number of Booth's accomplices have been arrested. The World, in a long and graphic account of the plot against the rulers of the nation, gives the following particulars:

Booth was the original projector of the crime, seconded by parties in Canada. He was furnished with a murderous accomplice in Payne from that section. Mrs. Surratt was the mother of the cenci, and Booth found another bloody accomplice in A. T. Surratt.

The route for escape was planned weeks previous to the act. When Booth escaped, Harrold left with him; they reached Surratt's at midnight, stopping at Lloyd's hotel to get a bottle of whisky, Booth remaining on his horse while Harrold went up stairs and got one bottle. Caroline Lloyd offered another, but Harrold said Booth had broken his leg and could not carry it. As they rode off, Booth called to Lloyd: "We have murdered the President and the Secretary of State." They reached Dr. Mudd's house before sunrise, and Booth had his broken leg set.

Among those under arrest as direct accomplices, are Spangler, the stage carpenter at Ford's Theatre; Samuel Arnold, of Baltimore, who claims to have backed out of the plot; Capt. Itell, who took Booth and bound him on his horse at Surratt's house—he was assigned to kill the Vice President; Mrs. Surratt, the mistress of the conspiracy; McLaughlin, a friend and confederate of Booth; Dr. Mudd, who set Booth's leg; Lloyd, who entertained the assassins and gave them a carbine; Sam Coxer, who concealed and fed Booth; Harrold, who was captured with Booth; Surratt, who shared the secret of the meditated crime; Payne, who attempted the life of Secretary Seward; Mrs. Adams, of Newport, who is believed to have assisted Booth; and Mr. Wilson, of Newport, who, though cognizant of the crime, did not assist justice.

The Executive order of November 21st, 1862, prohibiting the exportation of arms and ammunition from the United States, and the order of May 13th, 1863, prohibiting the exportation of horses, mules and live stock were rescinded by President Johnson.

Mosby took leave of his guerrillas at Salem, Fauquier county, Va., telling them to return home. He said he was bound for Texas.

Rebel treasury notes are selling at the rate of $2 to $5 per $1,000, as souvenirs.

The treasure removed from Richmond in the flight of the rebels did not amount to over $200,000. The train broke down, and the boxes were either broken up and destroyed, or divided, grab-fashion, among the soldiers.

The main portion of Sherman's army was en route to Washington.

Ex-Governor Aiken of South Carolina, was arrested and sent to the Federal capital, but was released by order of the President. He claims to be a Union man, and has shown every disposition to aid the Government—since the recent crushing defeats to the rebel arms—in re-establishing its authority and procuring the submission of his people without further useless resistance.

G. B. Lamar, a notorious secessionist, of Georgia, has been arrested.

Fifteen hundred Union soldiers formerly imprisoned at Andersonville, were transported down the Florida Central road on the 28th, to within 10 miles of Jacksonville, and unconditionally released.

On the 4th of May, the Constitutional amendment abolishing slavery in the United States, unanimously passed both Houses of the Legislature of the State of Connecticut.

Gen. Wilson's expedition through Alabama, made fearful havoc with the rebels in that State. In an engagement with Forrest near Plantersville, he captured 3000 prisoners and 3 guns. Selma, with 12 guns in position, 25 arsenals, 3 rolling mills, a naval foundry and arsenal, with gunpowder works and magazines fell into our hands. Montgomery surrendered without an assault. Foundries, magazines, railroad cars, steamboats, nitric works, etc., were destroyed here. Columbus was carried by assault, 1,200 prisoners, 53 guns, 100,000 bales of cotton, and immense quantities of ordnance and quartermasters' stores were captured. Wilson's total loss in the expedition was 350 men.

It is intimated that a demand was made by the Government on the Canadian authorities, for the surrender of such of the assassins and conspirators as may be within its jurisdiction. Tucker and Saunders have disappeared from Montreal.

The people of the interior of the State of Virginia were found in a state of great suffering, owing to the rule of the rebel military. Thousands were saved from starvation by the supplies of food which the United States Commissioners furnished them.

Robert Ould, late Confederate Commissioner of Exchange, W. H. Hatch, his assistant, and several other attaches of the Richmond Bureau, have been arrested on orders from Washington.

The country on the east side of the Mississippi from Tunicia Landing to Bayou Sara, is completely inundated for 35 miles; many of the inhabitants are starving. Morganza is abandoned on account of the flood. Fears are entertained at New Orleans of a more destructive overflow than ever occurred before.

The Army of the Potomac is en route to Washington. Its heavy equipments and paraphernalia go round by water.

Jeff Davis is still in rapid flight southward, pursued by Stoneman, and surrounded by Grierson and Wilson. Reports say that he can scarcely escape. It is said that, in the event of his escape, the evidence in the possession of the Government of his complicity with the late assassination is such, that no foreign government will hesitate in giving him up.

The civil machinery is being put in operation in Virginia. The State is divided into four districts, and the Secretary of the Treasury has appointed a number of assessors and collectors.

The President has issued an executive order, re-establishing the authority of the United States and the execution of its laws within the geographical limits of Virginia.

CITIZENS OF SAN FRANCISCO.—In response to the duty imposed upon us, "The People's Nominating Committee," we now present a ticket to be voted at the coming election. The offices to be filled are important—the faithful, or mal-administration of the affairs of which, vitally affects your interests. Your Committee have conscientiously and persistently kept this in view.

We believe in the men now presented, and place every name before you, confident of your approval. A majority of these are tried men—long known to you, and against the administration of whose trusts no word of censure is uttered. We have been exacting in regard to loyalty, and on this point we know all our candidates to be thoroughly sound.

Fellow-citizens—we appeal to the record, and show that the People's Party has done well by you. It has brought order out of chaos—economy in place of reckless waste—full protection to life and property—an honest ballot box, with vigilant watchfulness of all your interests—in place of all that was the reverse. Shall this continue? Is the policy of keeping our Municipal affairs distinct from all general party issues sound, or shall we go back to the old dark days of bargain and sale, waste and corruption?

We believe you will overwhelmingly reaffirm your previous endorsement.

Respectfully,
WALTER VAN DYKE, President.

BRADBURY'S NEW SCALE PIANOS.—The Evening Post, speaking of these, says: One of the interesting musical events of the season is the competition in instruments, and the success that has attended the exhibition of Bradbury's Piano Fortes at the several fairs recently held. This success is the more remarkable from the fact that a new competitor for public favor has always to contend with the prejudices of those who are interested in keeping their old favorites in the front rank; and it is only when the intrinsic merits of a new instrument are so apparent as to render opposition to it hazardous to their professional reputation that it can get a fair start.

There was a large number of fine pianos in this exhibition, and the managers of it devoted to them the largest and most prominent space in the main hall of the Academy building. Among these the beautiful square piano contributed by the manufacturer, William B. Bradbury, maintained a first place, being remarkable for power, brilliancy, richness, purity and equality of tone, combined with delicacy of touch, strength of frame and general excellence of mechanical manipulation. This piano has Mr. Bradbury's new and improved scale, which is now receiving the highest commendations from first class musical authority as well as the public generally.

It was awarded the first prize (a Gold Medal) at the fair of the American Institute, of this city, by Gotschalk, Beames, Berg and F. H. Brown.

We are informed by the managers that Mr. Bradbury did not manufacture this instrument especially for exhibition, but that it was taken promiscuously from his general stock.

ELECTION PROCLAMATION FOR THE MUNICIPAL ELECTION.

In accordance with the statutes made and provided, public notice is hereby given that the Annual Municipal Election in and for the City and County of San Francisco will be held on TUESDAY, May 16, 1865; and the qualified Voters of said City and County are hereby called upon to meet in their respective Districts for the purpose of electing the following named officers at said Election, to wit:

Mayor; Sheriff; County Clerk; Recorder; Treasurer; Assessor; District Attorney; Superintendent of Common Schools; Surveyor; Harbor Master; Harbor Commissioner; Coroner, unexpired term; Coroner, full term;

One Supervisor and one School Director in each of the following Districts: 2d, 4th, 6th, 8th, 10th, 12th, for the full term. Also, one School Director in the 8th District for unexpired term; and one School Director in the 12th District for unexpired term.

One Inspector and two Judges of Election for each of the twelve Districts; also one Inspector and two Judges of Election for the Second Election Precinct of the Twelfth District. In the election of Inspectors and Judges of Election, each qualified voter shall vote for one Inspector and one Judge of Election only, and the person having the highest number of votes for Inspector, shall be declared elected Inspector, and the two persons having the highest number of votes for Judges, shall be the Judges of Election for the respective Districts. (See Laws of 1857, page 210.)

Public notice is hereby given that the several Districts, as provided in the redistricting Act, approved March 21, 1864, are bounded and described as follows, to wit:

U. S. 7-30 LOAN.

BY AUTHORITY OF THE SECRETARY OF the Treasury, the undersigned has assumed the General Subscription Agency for the sale of United States Treasury Notes, bearing seven and three-tenths per cent. interest, per annum, known as the

SEVEN-THIRTY LOAN.

These Notes are issued under date of June 15th, 1865, and are payable three years from that time, in currency or are convertible, at the option of the holder, into

U. S. 5-20 SIX PER CENT.

GOLD BEARING BONDS.

These bonds are now worth a premium of nine per cent. including gold interest from November, which makes the actual profit on the 7-30 loan at current rates, including interest, about ten per cent. per annum, besides its EXEMPTION FROM STATE AND MUNICIPAL TAXATION, WHICH ANNS FROM ONE TO THREE PER CENT. MORE, according to the rate levied on other property. The interest is payable in currency, semi-annually, by coupons attached to each note, which may be cut off and sold to any bank or banker.

The interest amounts to

One cent. per day on a $50 note.
Two cents " " $100 "
Ten " " " $500 "
20 " " " $1,000 "
$1 " " " $5,000 "

Notes of all denominations named will be promptly furnished upon receipt of subscriptions. This is now offered by the Government, and it is confidently expected that its superior advantages will make it the great

THE ONLY LOAN IN MARKET

Popular Loan of the People.

Less than $300,000,000 of the loan authorized by the last Congress, are now on the market.

This amount, at the rate of which it is being absorbed, will all be subscribed for within four months, when the notes will undoubtedly command a premium, as has uniformly been the case on closing the subscriptions to other Loans.

In order that citizens of every town and section of the country may be afforded facilities for taking the loan, the National Bank, State Banks, and Private Bankers throughout the country have generally agreed to receive subscriptions at par. Subscribers will select their own agents, in whom they have confidence, and who only are to be responsible for the delivery of the notes for which they receive orders.

A NEW INVENTION!
LEWIS'S
Self-Acting Wagon Brake!

By means of this invention, the wheels of a wagon are made to lock themselves when going down hill, certainly and effectively, and are released the moment there is any strain on the horses, without attention on the part of the driver.

It is already in use in many parts of the East, and has everywhere given satisfaction.

It will lock a wheel so that it CANNOT REVOLVE, the efforts of the wheel to turn making the lock tighter.

It operates in an instant, locking or unlocking as necessary.

It needs no care and requires no exertion.

It cannot fail to work, and is easier on the team than the common brake.

Simple in its construction, and costing no more than the common lock, it gives perfect security, and a child may drive the heaviest wagon over the steepest roads.

It can be used in the same way as the common hand or foot brake: A touch on the lever will effectually lock the wheels, and

RUNAWAYS ARE IMPOSSIBLE.

State, county or shop rights for sale.

ASTHMA, CROUP,
DISEASES OF THE THROAT, BRONCHITIS,
Pains and Oppression of the Chest or Lungs,
DIFFICULT BREATHING,
AND ALL THE
DISEASES OF THE PULMONARY ORGANS.

ITS ACTION IS EXPECTORANT, ALTERNATIVE, SUDORIFIC, SEDATIVE, DIAPHORETIC and DIURETIC, which renders it one of the most valuable remedies known for curing diseases of the lungs. It excites expectoration, and causes the lungs to throw off the phlegm or mucus, changes the secretions and PURIFIES THE BLOOD; heals the irritated parts; gives strength to the digestive system, brings the liver to its proper action, and imparts, beyond the possibility of doubt, strength to the whole system. Such is the immediate and satisfactory effect, that it is warranted to break up the most distressing cough in a few hours' time, if not of too long standing. It is warranted to give entire satisfaction even in the most confirmed cases of Consumption. It is warranted not to produce costiveness, which is the case with most remedies, or affect the head, as it contains no Opium in any form. It is warranted to be perfectly harmless to the most delicate child, although it is an active and powerful remedy for restoring the system. There is no real necessity for so many deaths by Consumption, when ALLEN'S LUNG BALSAM will prevent it, if only taken in time.

THE AESTHETICS OF EATING.

SAVARIN'S Hand-book of Dining, noticed in our last issue, opens with the following eminently characteristic

APHORISMS.

I.

The universe without life would be nothing, and all that lives must be fed.

II.

Animals feed; man eats; the man of intellect alone knows how to eat.

III.

The fate of nations depends upon how they are fed.

IV.

Tell me what you eat, I will tell you what you are.

V.

The Creator, in making it obligatory on man to eat to live, invites him thereto by appetite, and rewards him by the pleasure he experiences.

VI.

Good living is an act of our judgment, by which we give a preference to things agreeable to taste, to those which do not possess that quality.

VII.

The pleasures of the table are for all ages, all conditions, all countries, and of great variety; they are the concomitants of all other pleasures, and when all the rest are gone, they remain to console us for their loss.

VIII.

The dinner table is the only place where men are not bored during the first hour.

IX.

The discovery of a new dish does more for the happiness of mankind than the discovery of a new planet.

X.

Men who eat hastily or get drunk do not know how to eat or drink.

XI.

Comestibles vary from the most substantial to the most light.

XII.

Beverages range from the mildest to the strongest and most delicately flavored.

XIII.

To say that a man ought not to vary his wine is heresy: the palate becomes deadened; after the third glass the finest wine in the world becomes insipid.

XIV.

A dinner without cheese is like a pretty woman with only one eye.

XV.

Cookery is a science. No man is born a cook.

XVI.

The most indispensable qualification of a cook is punctuality. The same must be said of guests.

XVII.

To wait too long for a guest is a breach of politeness towards all who have arrived punctually.

XVIII.

A man who invites friends to dinner, and takes no personal interest in his dinner, is not worthy of friendship.

XIX.

The lady of the house should always take care that the coffee is excellent; and the master of the house should be sure that the liqueurs are of the first quality.

XX.

When you invite a man to dinner, never forget that during the short time he is under your roof his happiness is in your hands.

As a pendant to philosophy of this exalted character, the reader will not be surprised to meet the following dramatic episode on the subject of "Frying." Observe with what graphic and artistic taste the scene opens:

HOW TO FRY.

It was a fine May day; the sun shed its warm rays on the roofs of the houses of the great city of delights, and the streets (a rare occurrence) were free from mud and dust.

The heavy diligence had for some time ceased to shake the pavements; luggage vans were silent, and only a few open carriages, full of fair ladies with elegant bonnets, passed at intervals.

It was three o'clock in the afternoon, when the professor sat down in his arm-chair to meditate. His right leg rested vertically on the carpet; his extended left leg formed a diagonal; his back reposed comfortably on the cushions, and his hands rested on the lion-heads that adorned the arms of that venerable household relic. His elevated brow indicated deep thought, and his mouth betrayed amiable distractions. His whole attitude was one of meditation; and any one beholding him would have mentally observed: 'That is a sage!'

Thus established, the professor sent for his head cook; and shortly he entered, ready to receive advice, lessons or orders:

"Maitre la Planche," said the professor, with that grave accent which penetrates every heart, "every man who dines at my table proclaims you a potagiste de premiere de classe; that is well, for the potage is the first consolation of a hungry stomach; but I am sorry to find that you have much to learn in the art of frying.

"I heard you fry yesterday, when that magnificent sole was served up pale, soft and discolored. My friend R. shot a glance of disapprobation toward you; M. H. R. turned his gnomonic nose to the west, and President S. deplored the failure as a public calamity.

"This misfortune has befallen you for having neglected theory, the full importance of which you do not appreciate. You are a little obstinate, and I have some difficulty in making you understand that the phenomena which takes place in your laboratory are nothing else than the results of eternal laws of nature; and that certain things which you do carelessly, simply because you have seen others do so, emanate, nevertheless, from the highest abstractions of science.

"Listen to me, then, with attention, and learn, that you may not again have to blush at your performance.

"Liquids exposed to the action of fire do not all attain the same degree of heat; nature has made them unequal in this respect; it is an order of things, the secret of which she reserves, and which we call caloric capacity.

"Thus, you may with impunity dip your finger in boiling spirits of wine; you would draw it out very quickly from brandy; still quicker from water, and a rapid immersion in boiling oil would make a cruel wound, for oil is capable of three times the heat of water.

"It is consequent upon this disposition that boiling liquids act differently upon solid bodies thrown into them. Those put into water become soft, dissolve, and form a soup: those, on the contrary, put into oil, condense, acquire a hue more or less brown, and end by carbonizing.

In the former case, the water dissolves, and extracts the internal juices of the substances thrown in; in the latter, those juices are preserved, because oil cannot dissolve them; if those substances dry up, it is because a continuation of the heat finally makes them evaporate in humidity.

"The two methods have also different names; the process of boiling substances intended for the table in oil or grease is called 'frying.' I think I have already explained to you that oil and grease are almost synonymous, grease being simply condensed oil, and oil liquid grease.

"Fried things are pleasant dishes; they make a tasty variation; the whole merit consists in the formation of the crust, or, to use the proper word, 'la surprise.' To do this well, the boiling liquid must be sufficiently hot for its action to be sudden and instantaneous: it requires a good well-kept-up fire to procure this result. To ascertain whether the liquid is hot enough, dip a piece of bread into the frying-pan and keep it there for five or six seconds; if you withdraw it firm and colored, make your fry at once; if not, stir your fire and try it again. The surprise or immersion once done, moderate your fire that the juices thus imprisoned may undergo, under a prolonged heat, the change which unites them and enhances their flavor.

"You will, doubtless, have observed that the surface of well-fried objects will not dissolve either salt or sugar, which, nevertheless, they need according to their peculiar nature; therefore you must reduce both those ingredients to the finest powder and use a sprinkling box.

"I will not tell you what oil or grease to use; your library contains sufficient books on that subject.

"However, you must not forget that when you have to fry trout, which scarcely exceed a quarter of a pound, which have been caught in some running stream, you must take the very best olive oil; this simple dish, well fried and adorned with slices of lemon, is worthy to be offered to a cardinal."

MUSICAL ACCENT. — At a trial in the Court of King's Bench (June, 1863), between certain publishing Tweedledums and Tweedledees, as to an alleged piracy of an arrangement of "The Old English Gentleman," T. Cooke was subpoenaed as a witness. On cross-examination by Sir James Scarlett, that learned counsel rather flippantly said: "Now, sir, you say the two melodies are the same, but different. What do you mean, sir?" Tom promptly answered: "I said that the notes in the two copies were alike, but with a different accent." Sir James: "What is a musical accent?" Cooke: "My terms are a guinea a lesson, sir." (A loud laugh.) Sir James (rather ruffled): "Don't mind your terms here. I ask you what is a musical accent? Can you see it?" Cooke: "No." Sir James: "Can you feel it?" Cooke: "A musician can." (Great laughter.) Sir James (very angrily): "Now pray, sir, don't beat about the bush; but tell his lordship and the jury, who are supposed to know nothing about it, the meaning of what you call accent." Cooke: "Accent in music is a stress laid on a particular note—as you would lay a stress on any word, for the purpose of being better understood. If I were to say, 'you are an ass,' it rests on ass; but were I to say, 'you are an ass,' it rests on you, Sir James." Reiterated shouts of laughter by the court, in which the bench joined, followed this repartee. Silence being obtained, Lord Denham, the judge, with much seeming gravity, accosted the chopfallen counsel: "Are you satisfied, Sir James?" Sir James, deep red as he naturally was, had become scarlet in more than name, and, in a great huff, said, "The witness may go down."

SUNDRIES.

The prisoners in the St. Petersburg insolvent debtors' jail have sent a telegram to their brethren at Paris congratulating them on the abolition of imprisonment for debt.

The author of a satire on Cæsar, M. Rogeard, has had to fly to Belgium. He drew too great a parallel between Cæsar and Rome and Napoleon and France.

An eminent London publisher, it is rumored, has made arrangements for printing the recent travels and theatrical adventures of Mr. and Mrs. Charles Kean.

Laura Keene, the actress, has purchased a fine farm of one hundred and thirty acres, a few miles north of New Bedford, Massachusetts.

Morning dancing parties are the fashion at Nice, just now.

Garibaldi gave a piece of ground at Naples for the erection of an English church, which has been duly consecrated.

Hugh W. Hoyles, who has been appointed Chief Justice of the Supreme Court of Newfoundland, is a native of the island. The Home Government has never heretofore conferred this high place upon a native.

It is rumored that the Emperor Napoleon will visit Algiers during the present month, and proceed thence to Oran and Constantine.

A begging letter addressed to the Emperor Napoleon began: "Sire, I received, under your late uncle, two mortal wounds—one at Wagram, the other in the leg."

As soon as the Indian telegraph is completed to Ceylon, England will get news from Australia in twenty-two days.

What an aggravating reminder, says Punch, to meet your most pressing creditor driving a pair of dnn ponies.

Queen Victoria is expected to visit Edinburgh soon, to inaugurate the Museum of Science and Art, the laying the foundation stone of which institution was the last public act of the Prince Consort's life.

William Cullen Bryant has purchased a homestead in Cummington, Massachusetts, (his native town,) and will beautify and improve it for a summer residence.

"It goes far," said Lady Montague, "to reconcile me to being a woman, when I reflect that I am in no danger of marrying one." No man could for a moment entertain so ridiculous a thought.

M. Adolfe Sax, of Sax-horn note, has brought an action against Mdle. Marie Sax for the illegal use of that name, under which she has gained such success as a singer. Her real name is said to be Marie Constance Sasse.

There is such a demand for Napoleon's Life of Cæsar in Austria and Germany, that the Vienna bookseller, Gerold, will hardly fail to make a large profit, although he has to pay the Paris publisher 85,000 francs for the copyright.

Cassell's autograph electric telegraph is now used on one set of wires between Paris and Lyons. Telegrams for it have to be written on sheets of metal which are sold by the telegraph office at four sous each sheet. The cost of despatching them is reckoned at the rate of four sous the square centimetre. Despatches cost 6, 12, 18 and 24f.

The American skater, Jackson Haines, at St. Petersburg, gave an exhibition of his skill, recently, which drew him in fifteen hundred roubles. One of his most daring feats is to lean back while skating backward till his hair touches the ice, and then, without help, recover a perpendicular position—a feat easy enough for any one, with the trifling exception of the "recover" clause.

It is a rather startling suggestion to make, but we believe it is nevertheless true, that the chemicals now used in the shape of bleaching powders, etc., in the manufacture of paper, and the effect of printer's ink upon paper thus constituted will in the course of two hundred years reduce all the books of the present day to dust.

Two hundred years ago the freemen of Massachusetts, voting in State elections, used corn and beans as indicative of yeas and nays, the corn being counted as yea and the beans as nay in the balloting; and when the beans were in the minority they acknowledged the corn.

Alex. Dumas heard of a sad case of distress at Antwerp, and sent 100f. and a letter full of sympathy to the widow. He then took a second thought which does him and his generous soul much honor. He wrote to the Mayor for permission to give a reading on behalf of the poor woman, got the influential people of the town to organize the matter, and went all the way thither and back at his own expense to give the reading.

The Dante Monument at Florence consists of a pedestal twenty-two feet high, having bas-reliefs on three sides, surmounted by a figure of Dante, eighteen feet high, executed by the sculptor Pazzi, of Ravenna. The author of the Divina Comedia is in the habit of a Franciscan monk, but without a scapula and hood; the head is encircled by a laurel wreath. The features were carefully worked from the cast taken after death, and now in the possession of the Torrigiana family.

ALAMEDA PARK HOTEL.

This new and elegant House will be opened for the reception of guests, on SATURDAY, the 18th instant. It is situated on the Alameda Encinal, within three minutes' walk of the San Leandro Railway, and three miles from the end of the wharf, between which and the foot of Broadway, steamers ply at frequent intervals during the day. The hotel can be reached by boat and rail, in forty minutes from Montgomery street. The location is in the midst of a dense grove, and, as a suburban resort, cannot be surpassed for beauty and healthfulness.

This hotel is splendidly fitted up with all the modern improvements, and in every respect will be conducted as a first class public house.

The proprietor would call especial attention of families to the attractiveness of this locality, so accessible, and yet retired, and free from the turmoil of the city.

Bowling Alleys, Billiard rooms, and all of the leading journals of the day will be at the disposal of visitors, while the sportsman can find an abundance of wild game in the vicinity of the hotel.

By a strict attention to business the proprietor hopes to merit the public patronage.

THE WILLOWS!

The HOTEL of this popular and fashionable place of public resort was opened to the public on SUNDAY, the 21 of April, 1865; also the grounds were thrown open to those who wish to spend a few hours of recreation and pleasure; also the Lodging Apartments, Restaurants, and Ladies' Refreshment Saloon, will be in readiness for occupancy.
The Shooting Gallery, Ten Pin Alleys, and Shuffle Boards have been replaced, and are now ready for public patronage, as well as the Flying Horses for Children, which are now in readiness to perform daily duty.
Ample Stabling is attached to the premises, attended by polite and watchful grooms.
The THEATRE has been newly decorated, and rendered more comfortable for public use, in which there will be a grand instrumental concert every Sunday Afternoon to be followed by a GRAND BALL.
The Grounds are thrown open to Military Companies, as well as for Schools, for Picnics, Military Parades, etc.
The Restaurant and Refreshment Saloons will be under the charge of WIMMER, the celebrated Caterer.
The Bars will be stocked with all the best brands of LIQUORS AND WINES, and nothing will be left undone to make the WILLOWS the grandest place of resort on the Pacific Coast. The Proprietors hope, by reason of experience and strict attention to the comforts of their guests to secure a share of the patronage of the public.
North Beach and Mission. Railroad Company Cars leave the corner of Montgomery and California streets every eight minutes for the Willows.
Programmes and Posters will be distributed throughout the city for Saturday and Sunday Performances.

DR. WISTAR'S BALSAM

-OF-

WILD CHERRY,

HAS BEEN USED FOR

NEARLY HALF A CENTURY,

With the most astonishing success in curing

Coughs, Colds, Hoarseness, Sore Throat, Influenza, Whooping Cough, Croup, Liver Complaint, Bronchitis, Difficulty of Breathing, Asthma, and every Affection of

The Throat, Lungs and Chest,

INCLUDING EVEN

CONSUMPTION.

There is scarcely one individual in the community who wholly escapes, during a season, from some one, however slightly developed, of the above symptoms—a neglect of which might lead to the last-named and most to be dreaded disease in the whole catalogue. The power of the “medicinal gum” of the Wild Cherry Tree over this class of complaints is well known; so great is the good it has performed, and so great the popularity it has acquired.

In this preparation, besides the virtues of the Cherry, there are commingled with it other ingredients of like value, thus increasing its value tenfold, and forming a Remedy whose power to soothe, to heal, to relieve, and to cure disease, exists in no other medicine yet discovered.

The unequalled success that has attended the application of this medicine in all cases of

has induced many physicians of high standing to employ it in their practice, some of whom advise us of the fact under their own signatures. We have space only for the names of a few of these:

S. H. Finley, M. D., San Francisco, Cal.
E. Boyden, M. D., Exeter, Me.
Alexander Hatch, M. D., China, Me.
R. Fellows, M. D., Hill, N. H.
W. H. Webb, M. D., Cape Vincent, N. Y.
W. B. Lynch, M. D., Auburn, N. Y.
Abraham Skillman, M. D., Boundbrook, N. J.
H. D. Martin, M. D., Mansfield, Pa.

The proprietors have letters from all classes of our fellow-citizens, from the Halls of Congress to the humblest cottage, and even from beyond the seas; for the fame and virtues of WISTAR'S BALSAM have extended to the “utmost bounds of the earth,” without any attempt on our part to introduce it beyond the limits of our own country.

TO CALIFORNIANS AND OREGONIANS.

In future all genuine WISTAR'S BALSAM OF WILD CHERRY for the Pacific Coast will be enclosed in a new wrapper which will bear the printed names of both SETH W. FOWLE & CO., Boston, Mass., and JOHN D. PARK, Cincinnati, Ohio, as well as fac-simile of the signatures of “I. BUTTS,” “SANFORD & PARK,” and “H. WISTAR, M. D.”

IN MEMORIAM

JEFFERSON DAVIS,

Repudiator, Speculator, Dictator;
Who enjoyed the distinction of being the first
And last

President of the Southern Confederacy.
A Christian and Chivalrous Gentleman,
He starved Union Captives in his Prisons,
And sanctioned the Massacre of Fort Pillow.
But his manners were courtly and elegant,
And his State papers models of excellence.
He was remarkable for his executive wisdom:
To provide material for his forces,
He ordered corn to be planted instead of cotton,
Which enabled Sherman to march through Georgia.
He perpetuated a Slave Empire,
Whose bondsmen were guides to the Union Armies.
Consistent in his inconsistencies,
He connived at the assassination of the only man
Who could have saved him from the gallows.
The incarnation of dignity and heroism,
He was taken disguised in his wife's petticoats,
Claiming exemption from capture
On the grounds of his femininity.
As such, friends, respect his weakness,
And that of the few who still admire him.

H.

THE MOUSE-TRAP.

"We that have free souls, it touches us not."

HAMLET—Act III., Scene 2.

THE President of "the so-called Confederate States," if the telegraphic accounts are to be believed, did not make a very graceful exit from the stage of political life. He is reported to have disguised himself in his wife's skirts and fled to the woods. When he was taken he complained bitterly at the manner in which the Government hunted down women and children! He could not persuade his captors that he was a woman, in consequence of the unladylike manner in which he flourished his bowie-knife. He could not make them believe it was a miss-take. We trust that one of our historical painters will transfer the scene of the capture of the President of the Confederate States to canvass; it would make a grand painting. The unhappy, hunted-down President trusted to his legs, and they betrayed him; his hoots were manly, if nothing else about him was. When those boots betrayed him, his heart sank into them; his sole chance of escape was gone. After all, Jefferson Davis may have been libelled again, as he was when he was reported to have sold off his furniture at auction. Perhaps he was not taken disguised in his wife's skirts in the forest, but simply captured disguised in the skirts of the forest! The telegraph does make such blunders!

The Call says: "In the early days of its organization the People's Party adopted 'Fiat justitia ruat cælum' as its motto. It should add to that legend, 'Ne sutor ultra crepidam.'" Certainly it should, and "Veni, vidi, vici," and "Vox populi vox Dei," and "E pluribus Unum." Bless your heart, the little Call will find lots of Latin for you in the back part of Webster's Unabridged!

The interior newspapers complain of "periodical beggars." We wonder if they mean canvassers for needy "literary" journals.

THE rebels comforted themselves while Grant was before Richmond with a little bit of Shakespeare:

"God and good angels fight on Richmond's side."

This was perfectly true, but they fought on the out-side—not the lec-side.

In Sacramento, on the news of Jeff Davis' capture being received, they hung him in effigy. Jeff was once rather a notable scoundrel, but now, "f-i-g for Jeff!" is the cry.

SOME one wishes to know the meaning of "Flectus, sed non fractus." We should say it might be translated, "I may go on a bender, but I won't get broke."

THE poor, war-worn South will now, it is hoped, gladly return to the Union. The author of her misery, has reached, or soon will reach, the end of his rope. The South is tired of him—it is considerably J. D'd.

GOTTSCALK this week went over to Oakland to soothe Pacific females with strains of delicious music, in the college instigated for the instruction of young ladies of that description.

A MAN of the name of Velly, was arrested this week for setting his dog on a Chinaman. His excuse was, that the celestial made use of the expression "no velly good," which he considered a personal reflection. The Chinaman, however, had reference to the other brute which harked at him as he passed.

THREE men on the Union ticket were elected. Pelton was supported because he was a martyr; the public like martyrs. Harloe had the Steam Navigation Company to back him, and Laidley got support from the same quarter. Others on this ticket would probably have been elected had they been sufficiently popular to gain votes enough to counterbalance those lost to them by the fact that the Flag favored their election.

OUR President, Andrew Johnson, has been sneered at by copperheads because he is a tailor; but he has a tailoring job in hand which requires some skill; he has to mend the breaches of the Union with a peace. His work is cut out for him, and he will no doubt finish it up in workmanlike style. The seat of rebellion is a good deal worn out, and will require a little patching, but Andy is no hotcher, and his work, when finished, will wear well.

THE works of William Shakespeare are pretty well known, and it grieves us when we see him misquoted. Surely even the Alta office boasts a copy of Shakespeare. Yet it would seem not, or that paper would have had the kindness to set Mr. Burnett right. This gentleman in returning thanks for a photographic album presented to him by the members of Col. Bulkeley's party, is reported by the Alta to have said:

"With all my love I do commend me to you,
And what so poor a man as Hamlet is
May do to express his love and friendship to you, Heaven willing shall not lack."

This is a little too bad. Two errors in a four line quotation from Hamlet! We cannot allow the right of either Mr. Burnett or the editor of the Alta, to substitute "friendship" for "friending," and "Heaven" for "God."

MAN is fearfully and wonderfully made; but how much more so is a fashionable lady. What mysterious things are the advertisements of milliners and dressmakers. We have before us now the advertisement of Mrs. Read, especially addressed to ladies. It is headed, "Ladies, attention!" then follows "Mrs. Read," which does very well instead of "Misses, read!" Mrs. Read furnishes ladies with "supporters." These are not husbands, but mysterious pieces of machinery to hitch up dresses and keep them out of the mud. She promises to give the ladies "perfect fits." Alas! we often hear of ladies' "supporters" giving them perfect fits about their dresses, and the bills incurred in providing them! We can understand all about the "supporters," but what does this mean? "Mrs. Read also has a beautiful style of bust, indispensable in a lady's toilette?" Evidently ladies as well as gentlemen go on "busts!" Mrs. Read does not confine herself to adorning, renovating and repairing the female form alone; she also has gentlemen's suspenders. She could doubtless furnish a suspender for Jefferson Davis, Esq., not that he is a gentleman or anything like one. We expect it is all right, and that ladies who wish for supporters, will not find they are leaning on a broken reed in trusting to this advertisement, even if Mrs. Read does advertise a "bust."

WHAT is the antithesis of "The goose hangs high?" "Swan's down?"

Maximilian, on reaching Orizaba, heard of the fall of Richmond and the capitulation of Lee, whereupon he hastened back to the capital, and dispatched his Chief of Cabinet, M. Elome, to the United States.—Telegraph Dispatch.

Max a trouvé qu'en Mexico,
Il a trop grande ane poignée,
Il dit a Eloise qu'il préfère,
Tres promptement d'être éloignée.

$5 REWARD.—LOST—On Sunday noon, May 14th, near Peter Job's Restaurant, a small black and white spaniel dog, blind of the left eye. The above reward will be given for his return, or information leading to his recovery.

We trust the owner of this one-eyed dog does not mean to cast any insinuation on Peter Job by stating that he was lost near his restaurant. He has, we hope, no misgiving that, "in eating mutton pies, he'll plainly recognize the flavor of his old dog Tray." Poor dog! Only one eye and the eye left blind. We sincerely hope the man may recover his dog and the dog may recover his sight. Stupid dog, to get lost. He should have kept an eye on his master, if he did only have one. If he strayed into the restaurant, and a French cook got hold of him, we can only say, "Peace to his (h)ashes."

WE notice an advertisement calling for "two good miners, one blaster and one striker." We can recommend an English friend of ours for the first position; he has for the last year been "blasting" all the mines in the country; having been unsuccessful in striking anything, he would not do for the latter. We suppose the "striker" would be required to produce proofs of his ability to strike a lead. We know of one man who invariably strikes for wages. We wonder whether he would suit.

IN the opera of Poliuto, or I Martiri, Mr. John De Haga took the character of "Calisthenes." A music-teacher in this city advertises instruction in "vocal gymnastics;" this is incorrect, but it might be allowable to call Mr. De Haga's singing "Calisthenics," on the occasion referred to, more particularly when he executed the perilous feat of swinging from A flat to B sharp—that is in music, of course; we do not intend it to be understood that Mr. De Haga changed from a flat to be sharp. There was not a flat on the stage on the occasion of the production of I Martiri, except those which were necessary on all occasions it being impossible to shift without them.

The special musical critic of the Alta evidently made mischievous notice of the first production of Faust, which was a fine specimen of trying to be honest and, at the same time, kind. He damned with faint praise. In consequence of this, he, it seems, is not to be trusted to write about the Opera at the Metropolitan—he is too honest. The old hand has gone back to the bellows, and this is what he makes of the job:

METROPOLITAN THEATRE.—Faust will be given this evening, for the second time. The musical riches of this great work require many hearings to be fully appreciated, and we trust the management will give us frequent opportunities to correct and strengthen first impressions.

Does the critic wish the public to have opportunities to "strengthen first impressions?" It will be had for the management if first impressions are strengthened. "Correct first impressions," that's what he means. What does he mean? Can anyone tell? Oh, Messrs. proprietors of the Alta, you'd better put your "special" on again, even he has a bad habit of telling the truth. The other man has never yet, in one single instance, succeeded in finding the right words to express his meaning. In five hundred "criticisms" five hundred grammatical errors appear. He is always using such ill-matched verbs as "strengthen" and "correct," and fancies they will travel side by side and pull together. When will he learn to bring forth his words as the beasts were led forth from the Ark, in pairs, instead of setting by the ears?

THEM.

HUNTING versus DANCING.—A correspondent, signing herself "A Sportswoman," writes as follows to the London Pall Mall Gazette: "Paterfamilias' has given us a most deplorable picture of ourselves as we appear after a run; but let me ask him, are there not many amusements besides fox-hunting in which 'red faces, torn dresses, and lank hair,' may be seen? What does he say to a crowded ball-room at five in the morning? There has been crushing, tearing, fuming, perspiring, to a far greater extent than any hunting-field. Such red faces! Such rough hair! Such tattered garments! Such lacerated arms! A lady's dress in the hunting-field is really one of the most modest in the world. Even if she falls, there is no revelation more indiscreet than a few inches of a neat Wellington boot, or a close-fitting trouser. Again has 'Paterfamilias' ever beheld a run after a crack sensational preacher at a crack sensational chapel? I have, and know that it beats fox-hunting into fits. The lady who was with me had her hair torn down, her bonnet crushed, her shawl carried away, her crinoline (thank goodness, there's none in the hunting-field) destroyed, and her temper—let me drop a veil upon it discreetly."

MITHRIDATES.

I CANNOT spare water or wine,
Tobacco-leaf, or poppy, or rose;
From the earth poles to the line,
All between that works or grows,
Everything is kin of mine.

Give me agates for my meat;
Give me cantharids to eat:
From air and ocean bring me foods,
From all zones and altitudes;

From all natres, sharp and slimy,
Salt and basalt, wild and tame:
Tree and lichen, ape, sea-lion,
Bird, and reptile, be my game.

Ivy for my fillet band;
Blinding dog-wood in my hand;
Hemlock for my sherbet canl me,
And the prussic juice to lull me;
Swing me in the upas boughs,
Vampyre-fanned, when I carouse.

Too long shut in strait and few,
Thinly dieted on dew,
I will use the world, and sift it,
To a thousand humors shift it,
As you spin a cherry.
O doleful ghosts, and goblins merry!
O all yon virtues, methods, nights,
Means, appliances, delights,
Repented wrongs and braggart rights,
Smug routine, and things allowed,
Minorities, things under cloud!
Fither! take me, use me, fill me,
Vein and artery, though ye kill me!
God! I will not be an owl,
But sun me in the Capitol.

[R. W. Emerson.]

THE ALHAMBRA.

THE first thing a man generally does when he gets into a new room, is to look out of the window.

And this is what I did, following the traveller's instinct, when I got into my bedroom at the Fonda Minerva, Acerra del Darro Carrera del Xenil, Granada. I had come in from a long ride across broad sandy suburbs, and through villages where old knights' arms were carved over every door; and now, having refreshed myself by slices of juicy melon and the sweet opiate of a cheroot, I ran to the window and got on the balcony, which looked out on the river and the street.

"Whereabouts is the Alhambra, then?" I said to the waiter who was obsequiously shifting a chair, looking out into the intense sunlight, that made me let go of the balcony frame as if it had been red-hot.

"Up there, señor," said the waiter, pointing to a hill rising above the line of range which my eyes had been skimming.

I looked, and saw a sharp-edged, square, red tower, rising out of trees on the hill before me. My first impression is of a cork model; of a pastille-box; of something almost toy like; but I remember the old Moorish inscription in the Alhambra bath-room: "What is most to be wondered at, is the felicity which awaits men in this palace of delight." So I cram down all depreciatory doubts, and start off to scale the steep Calle de los Gomeles, that leads to the gate de las Granadas, by which you enter the palace jurisdiction. That small trim summer-house-looking tower, not bastioned and bulwarked, like our own Gothic towers of strength, that deride the thunder and bare their breasts for the lightning to splinter on, raises fears in me, and I hasten to see if the Alhambra is a palace of the Arabian Nights, or only a mere tawdry ruin, bedaubed with faded color, like a bruised moth's wing.

I pass a fountain-square; and guided by where the citadel must be, begin to wind and climb. I observe that as Seville is duller and more monastic than Cadiz, so Granada is more lifeless than Seville, which is its hated rival. There are no jaunty majos; the women are not flitting about, but slough along, instead of stepping like deer; the houses are poorer, the streets narrower; the exquisite grated doors of iron filagree have thickened to jealous and suspicious-looking wood; the court-yards are smaller and less palpably Roman; the balconies seem less places of gathering and of gossip; there are fewer marble pillars and bananas; no diligences jingle and jumble at the doors. I ask the way to the Alhambra of a tinker who is soldering a kettle under a wall in the open air. He says: "It is only a casa de ratones" (a rat-hole.)

A Spaniard, not yet forgetting the old quarrel, cannot understand why you want to see an old Moorish ruin. The smart new casino in the Bull Plaza street is something; but that old kennel—bah!

What contempt the man who has been a day in a place has for the man who has just arrived! Just as I left the Fonda I spied an Englishman arrive, and instantly set out to scale the Tarpeian rock, for fear of being obliged to share in his crude view of the Moorish city of Boabdil. The last traveller I had met had a genius for contradiction, and a passion for discovering in every place a resemblance to Constantinople; so

I thought I would be more cautious this time, and be off with my superior wisdom of one day.

I expected a few olives, or some dusty-leaved vegetables, as I passed a lolling group of thirsty soldiers seated at the Horseshoe gateway, and entered the Alhambra precincts. I rubbed my eyes. Was I already in Fairyland? Why, it was English park—a great sloping hill-growth of spindly, wispy elms; real English elms, tall and broomy—run to seed, as it were, from over heat, perpetual irrigation, and want of thinning. Delicious green roofs they formed against those arrowy sunbeams, but no more in keeping with the Old Moorish palace than Bolton Abbey woods would be with the Pyramids. No wonder they form the special pride of favored Granada, that sweats up the hill to get cool under its shade, and listen to the nightingales, who, like the souls of dead Moorish women, sing all the noon-day long, in this English bramble-chained wood. But, why English? Why, simply because this wood was the present of the Iron Duke, who had the estate of Soto de Roma, with its four thousand once pheasant-haunted acres given him reluctantly by the grateful Ferdinand the Seventh, and who sent out these spindly elms, now spoiled by ill-culture, from England. There is a breezy stir amongst them as I pass. I think they know I am an Englishman, and want to ask me about their kindred; but I don't know the tree language; and I am in a feverish hurry to see the house the Moors built and colored for Time to make a meal of.

But still as I toil for the great wooden cross Cardinal Mendoza set up, and the ugly fountain beyond, I turn to look down delighted through the hundred yards or two of cool shade walk, at the great yellow glare of the street beyond, seen through the Horse-shoe entrance gate. It is the Valley of the Shadow of Death and Bunyan's Bright City conjoined into one. I go on and on, turning to the left, by a half-ruined tower, at the foot of which is a fonda, where some red-faced men from Gib are frothing up recurrent glasses of beer, and discussing Irving's Legends of Giant Moors, pass round a garden-walk at the foot of the wall, and reach the grand entrance, the Gate of Judgment, where, like Job or Samuel, the Sultan, or Cadi, sat and judged, grave in his green turban. Ever since thirteen hundred and seventy-eight that inscription of Yusuf, the founder, has been there over the inner doorway: "May Allah make this gate a protecting bulwark, and write down its erection among the imperishable actions of the just." The sons of Islam wrote over the inner brick doorway the name (which still remains there) of the warlike and just Sultan Abulwadi, Abn Maser, the Commander of the Moslems of Granada; and, as the inscription in the long-barred Cufic letters tell us, the door was closed for the first time in May, the month of the birth of the Prophet, when all the almond-trees in the Alhambra and gardens must have been in a tender pink bloom, when the white scented flower was on the orange, and the blood-red blossoms on the pomegranate. This was one of the four entrances to the old fortress. The others were: the Tower of the Seven Stories, through which Boabdil the Unfortunate went out, and which, as being unlucky, was afterwards walled up; the Tower of the Catholic Kings; and the Armory Tower; all built of tenacious concrete, the doorway jambs being of white marble, close-grained and crystalline, and the omega-arches of the hygone race, moulded of sharp red brick. I pass through the winding passages between the two arches, intended to make them stronger for defence in case of a rush of spearmen—who by these angles would be broken into detail and chopped up in detachments—and observe the blind beggars, who chatter perpetually of their infirmity, underneath the tawdry painting of a Virgin, covered with a sort of dairy-grating of wire, such as you put over meat in hot weather. Over that curious horse-shoe arch is a quaint open hand, carved, which has a talismanic and Arabian Night effect. Some say it typifies the hand of God, the symbol of power and providence; other mental spiders, who rejoice in spinning out fine silken threads of fancy, suppose it to be a type of the five commandments of Islam—to fast, give alms, to smite the Infidel, make pilgrimages to Mecca, and perform purifications. But the keenest of all steps in, and says it is only the old Roman talisman against the Evil Eye, such as we see in coral on Neapolitan lockets: the evil eye is specially dreaded by the Spaniards even now, their cathedral-towers being generally left unfinished, to ward off such malign influences.

Over the inner arch is a sculptured key, which critics, who always agree, decide was a badge of honor, and an emblem of the Prophet's power, like St. Peter, to open Hell or Heaven's gates. Our keen man, however, again stepping in, pushes by the crossed swords of controversy, and says the key was an old Cufic emblem, intimating Allah's power to open the hearts of true believers. It was a badge on the Almohades' banners, and is seen in many Moorish castles. There was an old legend before the Conquest, that the Christians would never take this red castle till the outer hand gripped the inner key: a story something like the old prophecy of evil to London when the dragon on Bow steeple met with the grasshopper of the Exchange; a meeting, which after the fire at Gresham's building, really took place, but without producing any special earthquake, or even raising the price of turtle soup.

I pass through the strong gates, now unwarded from the Infidel; pass the silent guard-room, where an old woman knits under the supposed miraculous picture of the Virgin, painted by Saint Luke, file up an enclosed lane—a sort of valley between fortress walls—and enter a space, under which are the old Moorish cisterns, which the donkeys that toil up for water from the low town of Granada have special reasons to curse. I cast a hasty look at the burnt brown giant stones that were heaped up by Charles the Fifth, to form his never-finished palace which the earthquake frightened him out of—and I run up the Torre de Vela, to see the magical bell that peasant girls use still for their love incantations, and read the inscription relating, with the exultant freshness of recent conquest, how Cardinal Mendoza, the night of the surrender, waved upon this tower, the flag of Leon and Castile, crying, con altus voces, (with a loud voice,) "Granada, Granada is taken!" I see the distant Sierra of Alhama, the gorge of Loja, the spot where Columbus turned back recalled by the messenger of tardily repenting Isabella, the old Roman Illiberis, the rocky defile of Moelin, the chains of Jaen, and mountains where the mules brought the snow for the Sultan's sherbet from, and the gate where the brave Moorish Decius, seeing the city was lost, sallied, as Irving tells us, to die in the camp of the Spaurard.

I pass through the obscure door that leads to the Court of the Fish-pond, repeating the verse of the Arab poet: "This is a palace of transparent crystal; those who look at it imagine it to be the ocean. My pillars were brought from Eden, my garden is the garden of paradise. Of hewn jewels are my walls, and my ceilings are dyed with the hues of the wings of angels. I was paved with petrified flowers, and those who see me laugh and sing. The columns are blocks of pearl by night, by day perpetual sunshine turns the fountain to trickling gold."

I left behind me a burning town; I passed through English plantations to a convict's prison, a deserted palace, an unguarded fortress. Now I pass through a rude door, and up some steps, and am in the palace of Haroun; Granada changes to Damascus. The Moorish arches, with their slender palm-tree shafts, rise round me, the walls are no longer stone-ramparts, but pierced trellises, that turn sunshine and moonshine into patterns, and seem like so much Venetian filagree. Surely they are needlework turned to stone, or some great Sultan has built them with panels cut from casquets of Indian ivory, though the piercing be not seen. The myrtles grow green and glossy round the great marble tank chest, one hundred and fifty feet long, which flows with mellow water, in which burnished fish—some apparently red-hot others of pliant silver—steer, flirt, skim, and splash. Never stop to think that the dry, whitish-brown, tubular-tiled, sloping roofs ought to be flat, and are not now Moorish. Do not stop to imagine the pierced marble balustrade that once walled in this bathing-place of the dark-skinned people; nor picture glowing Bathsebas—Roben's group of floating and laughing Sultanas, with female black slaves watching their innocent Diana gambols from corner stations under the shady portico. Air and water are the perpetual treasures of this place, and I tasted them both gratefully as I strode under the pointed arches, away from the burning lashes of the sun that drove me under cover. Beyond where the fountain bubbles like a singing slave (whose language I can only decipher as perpetual lamentation for the exiled Moor,) I pass through the oblong Hall of blessing, which is still as radiant with colors as the edge of a fading evening cloud, and where the cornices of inscriptions sing to the praise of some long dead Sultan, who conquered twenty fortresses, whose excellence ran clear through his great deeds, like "the transparent silk thread that joins a necklace of pearls." I learn from the rivers of poems that fret the wall that this unknown dead warrior made the very stars quiver in heaven, yet guarded the tender branch of the young-tree from harm. I learn that the stars shook when he stamped, yet that the bough of the willow bent before him in adoration.

Now I enter—intoxicated with the fragile yet imperishable beauty of the palace—the Hall of the Ambassadors, the golden saloon, with a dome which burst like a flower-bell sixty feet high up, is the Tower of Couares. An ingenious friend of mine, clever at theorizing (which is a sort of mental tight-rope dancing,) thinks the Moorish dome was suggested by the scooped out half of a melon; a theory which I cap by deriving the scalloped edge of the engrailed arches from the jagged edge of the aloe's leaf. In sober truth, I do not think much of any fanciful architectural theories, believing that sober, drudging necessity suggested architectural shapes, and that ornament was quite a superadded subsequent luxury. We first get our shirt, and then we put on the ruffles. We first roof ourselves in, and then go on refining about the shape of the windows.

The most beautiful thing about these Moorish domes is—not their grand poise and balance, or the spontaneity of their spring—but the airiness of them. They seem mere resting clouds swelling round you and canopying you with color

You have no sense of their weight or means of permanency. The stalactite ornament, too, as it is called, seems fashioned in emulous rivalry of prisoned, golden-ceiled honey-comb, in which honey still rests; honey, dyed by the juices of the flowers from which it has been drawn.

I go into the Sala of the two Sisters; so called from two gigantic sister slabs of Macaei marble, which pave the centre of the floor. I creak my neck with looking up, and let my eye soar upward and flutter like a bird in and out of those flower-cup cells; which seem the first creative types of some fresh world of fairy blossoming. A severe scientific American from "Bawst'n" will insist on telling me that the thing is very simple: it is a beauty put together by mere receipt. Those colored cells, so shapeless yet so harmonious, are mere prisms, united by their contiguous lateral surface, consisting of seven different forms, proceeding from three primary figures—the right-angled triangle, the rectangle, and the isosceles triangle. These components are capable of millions of combinations, just like the three primitive colors, or the seven notes of the musical scale. A simple receipt; yet no one can, now-a-days, cook anything like it. And grand, too, to think of the old artist, sitting down with his palette of changes on his thumb, with the three primary triangles, and three primary colors, producing in this one conical, helmeted roof alone, with his heels and plaster, an almost eternal sheltering of beauty, and some five thousand prismatic changes! "The carpentry of the roofs is tarnation 'cutely done," says my friend Spry, "and was derived by the Moors from the Phœnicians and Egyptians." (This is the vermilion roof mentioned by Jeremiah.) "But you should see the tower hall at Bawst'n!"

The Moors had a keen sensual sense of the necessities of climate. They were always thinking of the Arab tent. They wanted air and lightness. These marble pillars are the tent-spears grown to stone. This network lace veil that flanges every wall with cobwebs and harmonious color, is the old tent tapestry, the Cordovan stamped leather hangings, the Indian shawls that canopied the wandering and victorious horseman's tent. They did not want the Titan-dome of the Pantheon, or the great metal hell that hollows over St. Peter's; they wanted mere pendant flowers woven together into roof and gossamer-pierced panels, that hardly arrest the air. Everything must float and sway; they would not bar out the chirp of the dripping silver water in the garden-court without.

The pillars they thinned and shaved till they were no longer round blocks of rock, but mere banded flower-stalks, or young palm-trees, slender as spear-shafts. The spandrils are not corbelled beams, faced with figure-head monsters, but perforated props, as to some princess's cabinet. They have no Samson pillars that bear up the Atlas-load, and that, if falling, would bring down roof-tree and bower, in one common destruction. There is nothing to hold up, only ivory-patterned walls, and a honey-combed dome that floats in the hot air. As for the ornamentation—away with your Arabic Euclids and triangles! It was thus devised. The great architect, Ibn Aser, had roofed out the burning blue sky and the lightning heat with a plain bell-dome, after the manner of the Romans; but his soul was not satisfied, and he sat cross-legged on his prayer-carpet between the palm-pillars, looking up, and praying to Allah for more light of divine wisdom. At that moment came dancing in, with shell-shaped castanets, calabash guitars, Moorish cymbals, and the nose-flutes of Barbary, a band of Christian and negro slaves, waiting for their fair mistress, Nourmahal, the light of the world. Wanton in their joy, they flung about their arms, which, mingling together black and white, looked like night, just when it is changing into day. They began to pelt each other with handfuls of snow, which lay there in huge matted baskets, brought that morning on mules from the bosom-clefts of the Sierra Nevada; and the snow on the black faces fell as swan's down, but on the fairer faces it was as ice-dew on the early roses. Then, tired of this amusement, they began to toss hundreds of snow-halls aloft up at the domed roof, seeing which of them could make most snow adhere to the hollow globe; and when one obtained the victory, she laughed with a laugh that was a peal of silver bells. Then came the loud clapping of a black eunuch's hands, the signal that Nourmahal needed their services with perfumes and syrups in the bath-room, and they all fled like a herd of fawns when a wolf breaks from the oleander bushes. Then the architect, looking up smilingly at the clotted snow, hanging in bosses and tufts, cells and pendants, fell on his knees, and thanked Allah for so graciously answering his prayer. This roof (you will find the story in the Arabian Nights, or somewhere else) was fashioned from the melting roof of a snow-drift—it suggests delicious coolness—and the soft fretted hollows of half-thawed snow, flung up to the roof by playful hands, and modelled ere it fell.

But what about the color as it exists? Is it emeraldine, like humming-birds' wings, or plaited flowers? No, we must tell the sober truth. To call a rose a tulip is no pleasure to our mind. The color is dim and faded; buried under white flaky icicles of accursed whitewash, or blurred and besmirched as a dead butterfly's plumes. Here and there are revived bright scraps of azure, gold, and vermillion; but generally, it is dull of outline, and dim as a washed-out sign-post. It is not a bit like the hard, opaque, staring red and blue color you see in Mr. Owen Jones's, at the Crystal Palace—and it never was like that, I am thinking. Blue predominates; red and yellow are subordinated in geometric traceries of starred and crystalline harmonies. The walls are like pages of illuminated missals, framed by cornices of poem and prayer. Where the Spaniards coarsely imitate the Moorish work, the debased greens and purples obtrude, and show how inferior in decorative art civilization is to instinct. The dados, or low wainscoting, are of square glazed tiles, which form a glittering breast-high coat of mail up to the lower third of the palace walls. Here the colors are the same as those of the old Majolica china; the Raphael ware, which originated in the East, and may be seen now in any London curiosity shop window. The dyes are the same—orange-purple, dull sage-green and a reddish-brown. Sometimes these Azulejo tiles, with their low-toned enamel colors, are formed into pillars, or pave the floors in squares of fleurs-de-lis, or heraldic emblems, the willow-pattern blue predominating. The low, deep, shadow tone of these tile wainscots seems to me quite to disapprove Mr. Owen Jones' staring vermilion and opaque blues. In a country where the sun is solid fire, the Arabs wanted shade; and, in the dados, color is seen in the shade, such as you find in their Turkey carpets, deep, soft, and subdued. They did not want the red and blue stripes you see on child's peppermint. Mr. Jones will have it, too, that all the hundred and twenty pillars of white marble, eleven feet high, that in sisterly groups, as of hewn ice, support the pavilions and porticos of the Court of Lions, were originally of a flaming gilt. Only imagine the Moors cowering under windowless roofs and domes, which were perpetual caves of seented shadow, looking out on a fountained garden, barred in with burning pillars of burnished glass! These would have scorched their eyes out. There is, in fact, no trace of gold on the pillars—no shining streak or dull spot, or single dot of glitter. And, to prove our case still more, the ornaments of their strange basket-work blocked out capitals, are of white ornaments on a blue ground; the blue, the blue of the salvia flower; the white leafy tracery, the white surface of the original marble. Sometimes it is red with blue leaves, or blue on white with gilt bands and perpetual pious ejaculations of "Blessing! There is no conqueror but God!" Mr. Jones may say that white too is blinding; but marble, exposed to the air, soon grows of a soft mellow cream color. These phylactery sentences everywhere on the wall are traces of a custom that the Chinese still retain. When one or two lines perpetually stare at you from a wall the effect would become wearisome, or else the sentence would soon altogether cease to catch the eye or rouse the mind. Just as old Montaigne, talking of habit, says, in his quaint Gascon way, that after a day or two he ceases to smell his perfumed pounced leather doublet, therefore, what use was it? A dreadful argument upon the wearisomeness of repetitions. But these geometric Cufic letters crying aloud from the walls, of God's greatness, goodness, and power; of the builder's magnificence; of the Sultan's splendor, are so countless, harmonious, and interweaving—producing such cross-lights of poetry and praise, and sink, when the mind is torpid or indifferent to them, naturally and gracefully into mere surface ornament—that they are never out of place; but always an unsatiating charm. The long broken-shaped African letters wed to the Arabic scrolled writing, which is a later and more current hand; the one, like the Roman originated in stone inscriptions before men wrote much anywhere but on great men's tombs; the other, in parchment scrolls of physicians and Aristotle commentators. They both, though dumb to us, have a strange enchanted look to the Geringhee stranger.

There has been a great deal of dull disputation about the Alhambra, now ended, though it never should have begun. For instance, on each side of the ante-room of the Hall of the Ambassadors are too high cupboard-looking recesses, or niches, like the piscinas of our country churches. Blunder-wise men would have it, that this was where the attendants put their slippers before entering to an audience, till an Arabic scholar coolly pointed to an angular inscription round the aperture, which said, "If any one approach me complaining of thirst, he will receive cool and limpid water, sweet and without mixture." Any Spaniard ought to have known that here was where the Alegraza, or porous earthen bottle common to all, was placed; just as it is now placed in Andalusian gentlemen's halls, or on the bench at inns. In Spain, water is a necessity of life. In England, we wash with it and do not drink it; in Spain, they drink it, but do not wash with it.

Facing these apertures, Boabdil's throne was placed. Those living inscriptions still speak of it, like old babbling servants in some deserted country-house, now used as a show place. Hear them how they cry perpetually, "This dome is our father, and we, the recesses, his daughters. We are members of the same body, but the throne in the heart from whence our soul derives energy and life. Yusuf, my master, has decorated me (the throne) with robes of glory, and I am as the sun; these recesses being as a sign of the zodiac, in the heaven of this dome."

Now we go down beneath this throne-hall, to a network of dungeon-like passages, by which sultans often escaped in treasonable revolts, when the angry seimaitars were glittering in the fountain-courts, or when the Abencerrages were tossing their threatening spears in the buzzing city below.

It puzzles me always in a ruin to realize the actual life of the old inmates. Where did they keep their cold meat? sounds tolling in my ears. Where did they put their coals? Did they bruise their own oats? or did they double up their perambulators? are not questions more often and pertinaciously suggested to me. There seem no nooks; no corners; no lumber-rooms; no billiard-rooms, no pantries, no wine-cellar. True, there are their bath-rooms and alcoves; their little bins or windowless sleeping-rooms, as in Pompeian houses; their doorless porticoes and recesses, which gold tissue tapestries, and Mamelukes with drawn sabres, may have made private. But where are their kitchens? where are their store-rooms? It is true that, opposite the Hall of the Abencerrages where they show you a damp-red stain which is devoutly believed to be their blood, there is the Hall of the Two Sisters, where the Moorish King resided. Out of this there are square cells, for sleeping on cushions, just as if sleep was not a regular meal, but only a sort of lunch, to be taken in hasty snatches in lulls of business, as Napoleon took it. And, if you pass under the engrailed arches—like so many lace collars copied large in gilded stucco—you see curiously bolted Oriental doors; and a high latticed corridor, whence ladies in the Harem could look down at audiences or public dinners, seeing but unseen. When you go up, you fancy a sort of rose perfume, as from Damascus silk, still lingers about the place; you look round, and see it is only Bensaken, the famous guide, lighting his cigarette. Again, if you turn to the right from the Hall of Ambassadors and pass down a heavy Charles the Fifth gallery, you come to what Ford calls "a Bathsebah mirador," which is what the grumbling Spaniards, who hate Moorish antiquities, designate "the Queen's dressing-room." Chilly Flemish Charles blocked up the Moorish colonnade, which was draughty in winter, and daubed this boudoir well with sprawling Italian frescoes of the battle of Lepanto, which his brave bastard won. Thousands of Smiths and Joneses have scratched their names since on these green frescoes, and will obtain, doubtless, the degrading immortality they courted. Certainly there is in the corner a marble slab drilled with holes like a sink; through which, foolish guides say, perfumes were smoked up, while the radiant Sultana put on her rose silks and pearls above.

We also get a glimpse of life as we grope about passages with broken walls, that show the dark hollows of subterranean aqueducts. We come to the Moorish bath-rooms, stupidly called the dungeons of Ayesha. There is, as at Cairo, an entrance undressing saloon, and an inner vapor and shampooing bath, the separate seats of the Sultana being duly pointed out with the peculiar exactitude of guides. The vapor bath has a blue-dome roof, punched into star-shaped holes; just as you would pierce a pumpkin's rind. Shrieking the ponderous-panelled blue, red, and gilt covered ceilings of Charles the Fifth's apartments which look on the orange gardens of the Lindarajah, I come to the mosque, afterwards a chapel, purged and consecrated by Ferdinand and Isabella, the conquerors of Granada. The door was once plated with bronze, and, like all the rest of the palace, stripped and spoiled by succeeding generations of guardian thieves who allowed no one else but themselves to steal. You still see above the door the exquisite laced niche where the Koran used to be placed by the green-turbaned moollahs. The inscriptions which were dumb to the conquerors, still protest for the old faith, and cry aloud from barge board and netted rafter, "Be not one of the negligent." "There is no conqueror but God." "God is our refuge in every time of trouble."

I look through the mosque-grated window into the luxuriant garden run wild with a frolic luxury and intoxication of growth. I drag through a stray bunch of transparent gold grapes that sway at the bars around which its tendrils cling and twine like a creature loving its prison. As I pick the fruit the yellow and black-banded wasps follow each grape to the very door of my teeth. I hear the swallows speaking to me inarticulately from the burnt-up tiles.

Last of all, at least in this day's visit, Bensaken and my vivacious American friend, who still persists that "it is nothing to what we have in Bawst'n," drag me to the Hall of Justice, with its three court-rooms or apses, now blazoned with the royal Spanish badges of the yoke and the bundle of arrows. These three saloons are at the east end of the Court of the Abencerrages which faces the Lion Court, and indeed forms one side of it, with its forest of marble pillars and pavement channels for running water. Here, on the ceiling, are the curious old frescoes, painted on vellum in a rude sort of Byzantine manner by some Christian renegades, it is supposed; for the Moors think it impious to draw the human figure.

As the blue of dusk gets deeper, and the guide looks uneasily at his keys, I descend through the long avenue walk of the Alhambra, listening to the clatter of castanets from the fonda dancing-booths, and descend to my hotel, through winding, narrow defiles of streets paved with black and white pebbles arranged in scrolls and flowery branches.—Charles Dickens.

MISS M. E. BRADDON'S NEW NOVEL.

ONLY A CLOD.

By the author of "Aurora Floyd," "Three Times Dead," "Lady Audley's Secret," "The Doctor's Wife," "The Outcasts," etc.

CHAPTER XXVIII.

"OH, MY AMY, MINE NO MORE!"

FRANCIS TREDETHLYN drove his friend down to Richmond at a rattling pace; but he scarcely spoke half a dozen words throughout the journey, and Harcourt Lowther, keeping the watchful eye of the master upon his pupil, saw that something was amiss.

Now although the Cornishman's guide and mentor had his plans, very definite plans, as clearly drawn out as the great Duke's arrangements for Waterloo, which wondrous victory was not quite the lucky accident our neighbors imagine it to have been; yet he was far too wise a diplomatist not to ignore the sublime opportunities which chance sometimes throws in the way of a schemer, shattering the complicated machinery so dexterously and patiently put together, and opening a new and easy way to success over the ruins of the old road.

Mr. Lowther was quite prepared to make good use of any accident which seemed likely to help him. He was like a chess player who takes his place before the board with a perfect plan of action mapped out in his mind, and who may see his entire scheme overthrown, his most brilliant arrangements stultified by the first move of his adversary; but who will win the game nevertheless, after his enemy's fashion, if not after his own, being no enthusiastic advocate of pet theories, but only a man of the world, resolutely bent on success. Upon this particular afternoon Harcourt saw that something had gone amiss with his friend, and he was bent on discovering what the something was. With this view he had resort to that imaginary instrument which his companions of Bohemia called the "pump handle;" but on letting down a moral plummet into the depths of Mr. Tredethlyn's mind, he found himself in much deeper water than usual, and quite unable to reach the bottom.

"If he has secrets from me, he'll throw all my machinery out of gear," mused Mr. Lowther; "and yet I don't quite know that—a secret might be worked into something with her. What a wonderful creature that 'Iago' was, by-the-by! especially when one considers that he took all that trouble for no better motive than jealous twinges about a wife whom he treated like a dog, and an envious grudge of 'Cassio's' advancement. Ah, my divine Williams, that's the only flaw in your magnum opus; your motive power isn't equal to your ponderous machinery! Now if 'Othello' had been the owner of thirty thousand a year and a beautiful wife whom 'Iago' loved, there might have been some reason for the exhibition of a little Italian diplomacy. But revenge! Bah! The luxury of a maniac. The pet wickedness of a woman. Your novelist cannot write a story, your playwright cannot devise a drama; but he must have recourse to revenge to keep the action going. Yet in the history of men, how small and pitiful a part the heroic passion plays!"

With such random reflections as these, Mr. Lowther beguiled the silence of the drive to Richmond. During dinner and throughout the evening he watched his friend closely; but all the fascinations of Bohemia were powerless to arouse Francis Tredethlyn from the thoughtful mood.

Watch him as closely as he would to-night, there was something in Francis Tredethlyn's mind which Harcourt Lowther could not read quite as easily as a page in an open book, and as it was his habit to read most things relating to the Cornishman.

"What does it matter?" thought Mr. Lowther, abandoning himself to reflection again during the homeward drive; "let him keep his secret from me if he likes, and I'll use it for my own benefit when he plays against me. He is my dummy, and he plays my game. When he leads a suit of his choosing I am ready on his right hand with a cluster of small trumps. Play as he will he can scarcely throw me out. What does it matter how the game is won as long as one scores the odd trick?"

The day after this Richmond dinner was Sunday; but even that circumstance did not prevent Francis Tredethlyn from taking preliminary steps towards finding the missing girl whom he fancied quite within his reach now; since it seemed certain that the face he had seen on the stage of Drury Lane was the face of his uncle Oliver's daughter, and no other. It had been his habit until very lately to accompany Maude every Sunday morning to a fashionable place of worship, not very far from Sloane street, where miserable sinners lamented their iniquities, and their wretchedness, amid the subdued rustling of silk at a guinea a yard, and in at atmosphere that was odorous with Jockey Club and Ess: Bouquet. But "Star and Garter" dinners, and evenings "finished" in mysterious localities at the West End are by no means conducive to early rising; and now the Sabbath bells that Mr. Tredethlyn had been wont to hear ringing blithely in the morning air while he breakfasted with his wife, were apt to mingle with his feverish morning dreams, and to transform themselves into the shrill peal of an alarm bell summoning the fireman's succor for perishing wretches in some blazing habitation, or the bell on board a boat leaving a pier—a boat which the dreamer was, oh, so eagerly striving to reach, but never, never could; for just as his foot was going to step upon the deck, the plank on which he trod would give way and tilt him into the waking world; with a ringing headache perhaps, and a dull ceaseless pain in his breast, which he scarcely cared to acknowledge by its ugly name of Remorse.

So now Mr. Tredethlyn was apt to spend the earlier part of his day in the society of his devoted friends. Unhappily Mephistopheles has such a knack of making himself useful, that after once enjoying his society, Faust is apt to find life very dreary without that fatal companionship. Drifted away from the simple life that was natural to him, Francis was only a helpless creature, with all the dismal blank of existence to be filled up somehow or other.

But upon this particular Sunday he had a purpose of his own, and the honest energy with which he set about the achievement of that purpose, transformed him into a new being.

Harcourt Lowther might have felt a little twinge of alarm had he seen his pupil, as he walked away from the stuccoed district, with the old light in his eyes, the old lightness in his firm tread. Francis forgot that he had an empty life to drag out, and an idolized wife who did not love him. He forgot everything except that he had to redeem his half-forgotten vow, to fulfil a long-neglected duty.

"My uncle Oliver's money brought her peace of mind, and prosperity for the father she loves so dearly," thought Mr. Tredethlyn. "Let me remember that, when I think of his disinherited daughter."

Crumpled in one of the pockets of his over-coat, Francis had found the programme of the performance at Drury Lane, and in the long list of names crowded together at the bottom of the programme, he discovered—half hidden amongst Percies and Vavasours, Vane Tempests, and Leweson Gowers, and such appellations as the corps de ballet modestly chooses for its own—the vulgar name of Turner. He concluded, therefore, that his cousin had called herself Turner at Drury Lane Theatre, as well as at Coltonslough, and he did not anticipate much difficulty in finding her. The search after any information upon theatrical matters might have seemed rather a hopeless thing on a Sunday, but Francis Tredethlyn's energy was not to be damped by small difficulties.

"I have wasted too many hours already," he thought; "where my poor lost girl is concerned, every moment of delay seems a new wrong."

He took a hansom and drove straight to the theatre, but Drury Lane on a Sunday seems an utterly hopeless and impracticable place. The stage-door was closed. The box-office might have been the tomb of the Pharaohs for any appearance of life within its portals. Happily Francis was not to be disheartened. He walked up and down the street until the clock struck one, and a dense crowd began to pour out of a chapel in Crown Court, and disgorge itself into Little Russell street. Then when the doors of the public-houses were opened, he entered a tavern nearly opposite the stage door and made his inquiries.

The barmaid at the tavern was able to tell him where the stage-doorkeeper lived, but she was not able to give him any information as to the habitations of the ladies of the ballet.

"Most of them live out at Camberwell, or up Islington way, though how they manage it, poor things, walking backwards and forwards through all sorts of weather, is more than I can tell. They send over here when there's long rehearsals for their half-pint of porter and their sandwich, and that's about all the dinner they get on such days, I dare say."

Thus, discursively, the barmaid, Francis left her, and made his way to the adjacent court in which the doorkeeper was to be found in his private capacity. That gentleman was in the midst of a very greasy dinner and in the bosom of his family, when Mr. Tredethlyn intruded on him, and was at first inclined to resent the interruption.

"I don't carry two hundred and forty-nine addresses in my blessed head," he remarked, in an injured tone; "which our company at the beginning of this season numbered over two hundred and forty-nine; and I don't care to be hunted up on Sundays when I'm eating of my dinner for a pack of ballet girls. I don't get paid for that when I take my salary. If any young swell wants to find out one of our ladies' address to leave 'em a bokay, or to take a ticket for their benefit or such like, I should think they could find it out of a week-day, and not come chivving of a man over his Sunday vittles."

But a judiciously administered half-sovereign had a very soothing effect upon the mind and manners of the doorkeeper. There are so few things in a small way that cannot be done with half a sovereign. The man laid down his knife and fork and applied himself to serious reflection, while his wife and family suspended their operations to stare admiringly on the fashionably-dressed intruder.

"Let me see," said the doorkeeper, scraping his stubby chin as he mused, "there's such a many of 'em that I may sit here trying to remember where this here Miss Turner lives till doomsday, and not be no wiser. I'll tell you what I'll do with you, sir; I've got the addresses of every member of this company in my book over the way. I'll slip over and get Miss Turner's direction while you wait here, if you like."

"Over the way," was Drury Lane Theatre. The doorkeeper took some ponderous keys from a nail over the mantelpiece, and put on his hat. Francis Tredethlyn went with him.

"Turner," said the man; "Turner? A pale-faced young woman, ain't she? Looks as if she'd gone through no end of trouble. She's only an extra, took on for this here great piece that's just done with."

"An extra?" inquired Francis.

"Yes; a sort of supernumery; not a regular ballet girl, can't dance, or anything of that sort, only fit to go on in crowds, and so on. I remember her, a very quiet, civil-spoken young person."

The address was soon found; it was at a house in Brydges street. Francis left the doorkeeper with his heart beating tumultuously, his face pale with emotion that was half joy, half pain—joy at finding her at last, when hope had almost died out into forgetfulness—pain at finding her thus. Ah, yes! it was very painful to remember the innocent rosy face peeping out of a dimity bonnet, and to know that sorrow had set its undefaceable hand upon that rustic beauty, and that the face he remembered had no more a place upon this earth.

"Miss Turner and Miss Willoughby live together over an eating-house in Brydges street," the doorkeeper had told Francis, with the further information that he was to pull the top bell twice. Mr. Tredethlyn found the eating-house, which was ostensibly closed; but the door of the shop was ajar, and the atmosphere about and around it seemed greasy with the steam of suet pudding and boiled meat. The bell which Francis rung was answered by a care-worn looking woman of doubtful age, who had an air of faded gentility, a flimsy smartness of apparel, which was more than demonstrative of poverty than the shabbiest garments that ever hung together loosely upon the figure of a slattern.

"Miss Turner lives here, I believe?" Francis said eagerly; "I wish to see her, if you please."

"Miss Turner did live here," the woman answered, "but she has left."

"Left? Why I saw her at the theatre only the night before last, and the doorkeeper has just directed me here."

"Miss Turner's engagement expired last night, sir, and she left London this morning."

"This morning, only this morning! But of course you can tell me where she has gone? I am her first cousin, her only surviving relative. If I had known that there was the least chance of her leaving London, I should have tried to find her last night. Will you be good enough to direct me to her?"

The woman shook her head.

"I don't know where Miss Turner has gone,"

Tredethlyn's face whitened to the very lips.

"My God!" he exclaimed, "is there a fatality in this business? am I never to find her?"

Then addressing himself to the woman with sudden earnestness he said—

"For pity's sake, if you can help me in my difficulty, do so with all your might. You do not know how much depends on my finding her. I scarcely think I should say too much, if I were to tell you that it is a matter of life and death, for I saw my cousin's face the night before last, and it looked to me like a face that is fading away from this earth. You have been told, perhaps, to give no one her address; but she did not think that her cousin Francis would come to ask for it. Pray trust me and believe in me; I am the only friend that poor girl has in all this world."

"I have told you the truth, sir," answered the woman, quietly; "I do not know where Miss Turner has gone. Anything I can tell you about her, I shall be happy to tell," she added, as if answering the look of blank despair in Francis Tredethlyn's face; "but it is very little. Will you step up stairs to my room? It is only a humble place, but it will be quieter there than here."

This could scarcely fail to be true, for during the very brief interview which had just taken place, Francis had been brushed against and flouted some half-dozen times by young persons with jugs and door-keys, going to and from a neighboring public-house. It was the popular dinner-hour in Drury Lane, and four separate floors, with their minor divisions of backs and fronts, were more or less engaged in the business of dining.

Francis followed his cousin's late associate, Miss Willoughby, up three steps of rather dingy stairs, upon which little colonies of children had established themselves here and there with their toys. One young gentleman of tender years was trying to fly a kite in the well of the staircase, with a persevering disregard of atmospheric difficulties and the heads of the passers below, while a young lady, belonging to an adjacent tribe of settlers, took her doll for an airing in a lobster shell, drawn by a string which wound itself about Mr. Tredethlyn's legs and had to be unwound like a bandage. Occasional skirmishers from distant settlements came sliding down the bannisters, which, compared to the stairs, were as the modern railroad to the ancient highway, assailing peaceable families with the war-whoop of defiance; and the cries of "Shan't," "Do it again, then, there!" "Wouldn't you just like to, now?" "Won't I tell my mother, that's all?" "Telltale tit, yah!" resounded in a delightful confusion of voices from the first floor to the attics.

Miss Willoughby conducted Francis to a back room upon the third floor, a dark, gloomy little room, hung with chocolate and drab paper, but enlivened by a little gallery of theatrical photographs, and some engraved portraits cut out of Tally's Shakspeare, neatly arranged over the mantel-piece.

It was not very difficult to perceive that the anomalous piece of furniture, which was too vividly brown for mahogany, too elaborately grained for nature, and which was not quite a chest of drawers, nor altogether a ward-robe, was neither more nor less than a member of the mysterious family of press-bedsteads. It was not difficult to perceive that industrious poverty and simple independence reigned in that three-pair-back, whose pitiful goods and chattels, and worthless scraps of ornament, were arranged with as exquisite a neatness as might pervade the chambers of a bachelor in the Albany, or a gandin of the Faubourg St. Honore.

"I shall miss your cousin very much," said Miss Willoughby; "we got on so nicely together."

"She lived with you? Here?" asked Francis.

"Yes; we shared this apartment. It made the rent come lighter for both of us, and apartments are so dear in London; and of course it was the same advantage in coals, not that we wanted many for our little bit of cooking, but one can't even boil a kettle without a fire; and saveloys and sandwiches are apt to pall upon one after a long continuance; so having Miss Turner to live with me made it altogether come much pleasanter; besides which we always were the best of friends."

Mr. Tredethlyn was slow to answer. He was looking round the room, and out at the leaden ball floating on the surface of a dingy leaden cistern, visible athwart some scarecrow geraniums, which looked as if they had been put upon a short allowance of mould. Everything in the place, from the scrimped morsel of worn carpet, which only made an oasis of Kidderminster in a dreary desert of boards, to the handful of red coals that burned brightly between massive embankments of brick, bore mute evidence to the poverty which struggles and endures. An open cupboard stared Francis in the face, and he saw, oh, such a pitiful morsel of sickly complexioned ham, lying cheek by jowl with the rag end of a stale half-quartern loaf. He looked at these things, and remembered the house in which he lived, the reckless extravagance that pervaded all his life.

"Does a curse cling to the gold of a miser?" he thought; "and is my uncle Oliver's child never to know any profit from the wealth her father scraped and pinched together, at the cost of everything that makes life endurable?"

He roused himself from his brief reverie to appeal once more to the elderly ballet girl, who had seated herself by the little Pembroke table, on which lay a newspaper evidently borrowed from the establishment below, and transformed into a kind of parchment by the action of grease.

"Give me what information you can about my cousin," he said, imploringly; "and if you will accept any little present from me in acknowledgment of your kindness, I will send you a cheque to-morrow morning, and you shall purchase what you please as a memorial of your friendship for my poor little Susy."

A faint flush kindled in Miss Willoughby's pale cheeks. A cheque! Oh, bright representative of an El Dorado, only to be thought of in some happy dream. Clara Willoughby, otherwise Mary Anne Jones, had not seen such a thing as a cheque since the happy time in which she had been columbine at the tumble down little theatre in a garrison town, and the colonel himself had taken five pounds' worth of tickets for her benefit.

"You are very kind," she said; "but I don't want any payment for the little help I can give you. Miss Turner is a very quiet young person; and though we were so friendly together, she never told me anything of her history; and when she went away this morning, having only been taken on as an extra, and her engagement expiring last night, she said, 'You've been very good to me, Clara, and I shall always remember you kindly; and if things go well with me, I'll write and tell you where I am. You mustn't be offended because I don't tell you where I am going. I don't quite know myself. I have not made up my mind yet; there's a place I want to go to, and friends I want to see, but I don't think I shall ever bring my mind to go there, or to see them.'"

"I think I understand her," said Francis. "I think the place she means is her old home. If she goes there I shall hear of her immediately; but if—if she should not be wise enough to return to the friends who would be so glad to shelter her—Did she ever speak of her home, or of her cousin Francis Tredethlyn?"

"Never! She seemed to have some settled grief upon her mind; and having known trouble myself, I know how hard it is to be worried by strangers' questions and strangers' pity, even when it's meant ever so kindly; so I never asked her to tell me so much as one word about her former life."

"But how did she come to be at the theatre with you? I should think of all ways of earning a living, that must be the very last that would occur to my cousin Susan."

"That's very true," answered Miss Willoughby; "but it doesn't take a woman long to come to the last way by which she can earn her bread—the ways are not so many. I can tell you how your cousin came to be at Drury Lane, for I was the means of getting her engaged; and it all came about, as one may say, quite promiscuously. I suppose you know that Susan Turner is a married woman?"

"Yes, I do know of her unhappy marriage."

"She called herself Miss Turner in the bills, because, you see, in the theatrical profession a single female is always considered more attractive; though why it should be so, unless with regard to boys in jackets in the Christmas holidays being so apt to fall in love with the columbine, and might find it damping to their spirits to know she was the mother of a family, I really can't imagine. However, Susan was Miss Turner in the bills, and I am Miss Willoughby for the same reason, although I've been thirteen years a widow come next boxing-night. Perhaps you may remember the sprite who was killed by a fall off a flying bridge in Harlequin Buttercup, or the Maiden all Forlorn; the Fairy Queen of the Daisies, and the Cow with the Crumpled Horn, twelve years ago last Christmas? Not being professional yourself you may not happen to remember the circumstance; but Signor Wilsonio was my husband. He was not an Italian, and his name in private life was Wilson. We had been married two years, and he left me with a little boy just six months old."

Francis listened very respectfully to this fragment of family history, but he chafed under its infliction nevertheless.

"If you will tell me how you came to—" he began.

"I am just coming to that," answered Miss Willoughby, with dignity. "My poor husband, not having anything to leave me, except a complimentary benefit, which the manager of the theatre allowed me on account of my bereavement, I was obliged, of course, to continue in the profession; and oh, sir! nobody that hasn't gone through it can tell the pain of having to change your widow's weeds for white muslin and spangles, and put away your baby from your breast to go and slap cheesemongers' shops into furnished lodgings with a harlequin's wand. As soon as I could get over the dreadful kind of numbness that came upon me in the first of my troubles, I looked out for some one who could take care of my child; for I need not tell you that you can't leave an infant in arms in unfurnished lodgings without attendance, and with black looks from your landlady if you so much as ask for your fire to be poked once in an evening in a friendly way, and much less a child, which is apt to be trying to the best of tempers. Well, sir, inquiring of one and another, I heard of a very respectable, elderly person who had seen better days; and it does seem odd, but people connected with bringing up children by hand always have seen better days. The elderly person lived down Chelsea way, close to the water, which was considered healthy, and next door but one to a cowkeeper—also considered healthy, especially if predisposed to consumption."

"If you would only—" murmured Francis, despondently.

"Which I am just coming to," answered the ci-devant columbine, again with dignity. "The long and the short of it is, I took my baby to the respectable, elderly person at Chelsea, and there he's been ever since, at seven shillings a week, which is a hard struggle sometimes now, though light enough when I was engaged as columbine; but dancing has made such progress, and unless you can take flying leaps from one side of the stage to the other, a manager won't look at you."

"But with regard to—"

"Which I am about to explain," continued Miss Willoughby, with unshaken calmness. "It was at the respectable elderly person's that I first met Miss Turner; for my darling baby having learnt to call his nurse Nungey, and taking so to her, and not taking to anybody else, and she so attached to him, that she froze my very blood by talking of Battersea Bridge in quite a meaning way when I spoke of taking him away. Owing to this and one circumstance and another, Harry has stopped at Chelsea till he's quite a big boy. So, course, I very often go to see him, not that he takes to me so much as he ought to do, being so wrapped up in his Nungey. And one day, about three years ago, I went there quite promiscuously, and found Harry walking up and down before the door with a baby in his arms; and the nurse told me that she'd put an advertisement in the paper, and the very day it was inserted a lady came to her—a sweet looking creature, she said—and left this baby, which might be going on twelve months old. Well, the long and the short of it is, that this was your cousin Susan's baby; and going there off and on, I saw a good deal of your cousin; but see her as much as you would she was so quiet and reserved, that you never got anything like intimate with her. At first she was dressed like a lady, and she had a pretty little gold watch and chain and many things that had cost money; but little by little all these disappeared, and she seemed to get very poor. One day, when I was there, it came out somehow that she was doing plain needlework for one of the great cheap outfitters' houses in the City, and it came out what a hard life it was, and, worse than hard—uncertain; so then, knowing there were 'extras' wanted for the new piece, I proposed to her that with my help she should try and get engaged. It would be much lighter work than the plain sewing, and better pay. Well, at first she was very much against it, but after a deal of persuasion she gave way, and I got her the engagement for her. That was full five months ago; for the piece had a long run. She had been lodging in one room at Chelsea until then, for the sake of being near her boy, and she left that lodging to come and share mine."

"And do you think she will go back to the old lodging?" "I doubt it. She seemed so uncertain that I really don't think she'd made up her mind where to go."

"But she is likely to have gone straight to her child!" cried Francis. "Will you give me the address of the old woman at Chelsea? Oh, I thank you so much for giving me this clue. I must find my poor girl now!"

The sprite's widow opened a little portfolio and wrote an address on a scrap of paper, while Francis stood by, eager to take it from her.

"Do you know that there has been an advertisement, appealing to my cousin, in the columns of the Times newspaper a hundred times within the last two years?"

"Dear! dear!" murmured the ballet dancer; "and she going through so much, with rich friends looking for her all the time. But you see, poor people can't afford to take in a newspaper, and there might be only a threepenny paper standing between a man and a million of money, and he nouse the wiser."

She handed Francis the address which was a very long one. And then she gave him divers verbal directions, the gist of which was, that he was to find a certain public-house, called "The Man in the Moon," and was then to inquire of anybody for a certain street, and was to go a little way further and inquire again, thus accomplishing his journey by easy stages and frequent inquiries.

But Francis was much too full of hope to be dashed by any small difficulties. He grasped the dancer's hand in his heartiest way, and left Brydges street in impetuous haste. The Hansom cabman, who met him at the corner of Russell street, and drove him thence to "The Man in the Moon," was a lucky individual, and went home rejoicing to the bosom of his family. But after dismissing the cabman, Francis had to thread his way through intricacies which would have been maddening in a Hansom cab, and were only to be overcome by repeated inquiries and frequent reference to Miss Willoughby's written direction.

At last, however, while the bells were still ringing for afternoon services, Francis Tredethlyn found the place, which was a damp little street without any thoroughfare, called Pollard's Row. Pollard's Row, with the summer sunlight on it, and given up entirely to the occupation of one mongrel dog, which was lying with his head upon his fore-paws, snapping at imaginary flies, was a dreary place to contemplate; but Francis Tredethlyn troubled himself very little about the aspect of the neighborhood. He walked rapidly past the little row of houses until he came to No. 17, which was occupied by the respectable elderly person, otherwise Mrs. Clinck.

The elderly person made some faint show of a commercial character in the shape of three very green pickle bottles containing confectionery, all more or less melted out of its normal mould by long exposure to the sun, and some gingerbread figures of a weird and ghastly outline, supposed to represent the human form. A tattered ehintz curtain hung upon a limp string, and made a background to these wares. Looking across this curtain Francis Tredethlyn saw a woman sitting in the ruddy glow of the fire, with a child in her lap, and knew by the beating of his heart that he had found his cousin Susan.

The door of No. 17 stood ajar. Francis pushed it open and went into the passage. Three steps brought him to the door of the little room, which was a compound of shop and parlor, with a slight flavor of bedroom. A woman—a girlish creature still, but pale and worn-looking—was sitting in a low nursing-chair, with a child of four years old in her arms. Alas for the handiwork of Sorrow, the destroyer! the soft brown hair, the tender hazel eyes, alone remained of the rustic beauty which Francis Tredethlyn remembered smiling at him upon the moorlands of his native county.

"Susie, my darling, my pet. At last, at last I have found you!"

The boy slid from his mother's arms, frightened by this tumultuous stranger. Susan rose pale and trembling, and shrank away with her hands spread before her face, as if even now she would have hidden herself from her cousin.

"Oh, Francis," she cried, "don't come near me—don't look at me. Oh, Heaven have pity on me! I have so prayed that none who ever knew me in my childhood should see me now."

"But, my darling, why, why should you hide yourself from those who love you so fondly?"

She made no direct answer, but covered her face with her hands and sobbed aloud.

"Oh, my shame—my shame! Who will believe me when my father would not?"

THE WEeping WILLOW.

(SALIX BABYLONICA.)

THE Latin name, Salix—signifying to spring up—well describes the rapid growth of the Willow tribe. This characteristic, as well as its choice of situation, is beautifully alluded to in Isaiah, xlv., 4: "They shall spring up as among grass: as willows by the water-courses."

Over one hundred and fifty different species of the Salix have been enumerated and described by Sir James T. Smith. The one denominated Salix Babylonica, the Weeping Willow, is a native of the Levant, the coast of Persia, and other places in the East. The manner of its introduction into England is curious. The account is as follows: Pope, the celebrated poet, having received a present of Turkey figs, observed a twig of the basket in which they were packed putting out a shoot. This twig he planted in his garden; it soon became a fine tree, and from it all the weeping willows of England have descended. This particular tree was felled in 1861, a circumstance which all regretted.

The Salix Babylonica is generally planted by a still pool of water, to which it is a beautiful and appropriate ornament, and when, in misty weather, drops of water are seen distilling from the extremities of its branches, nothing can be more descriptive than the title it has obtained of Weeping Willow.

"Thus o'er our streams do eastern willows lean

In pensive guise, whose grief inspiring shade

Love has to melancholy sacred made." [Deille.

Ovid gives a very good description of the situation in which willows generally grow:

"A hollow vale, where watery torrents gush,

Sinks in the plain; the osier and the rush,

The marshy sedge and bending willow, nod

Their trailing foliage o'er the oozy sod."

Among the British poets who have sung of this plant, most have alluded to the willow being considered the emblem of despairing love. Herrick says:

"A willow garland thou didst send,

Perfumed, last day, to me;

Which did but only this portend,

I was forsook by thee.

Since so it is, I'll thee what:

To-morrow thou shalt see

Me wear the willow, after that

To die upon the tree."

And Spencer calls the tree,

"The willow worn by forlorn paramour."

Shakspeare thus represents Dido lamenting the loss of Aeneas:

—"In such a night

Stood Dido, with a willow in her hand,

Upon the wild sea banks, and waved her love

To come again to Carthage."

And again in relating the death of Ophelia:

"There is a willow grows aslant the brook

That shows his hoar leaves in the glassy stream.

Therewith fantastic garlands did she make,

Of crow flowers, nettles, daisies and long purples.

There on the pendent boughs her coronet weeds

Clambering to hang, an envious silver broke;

When down her weedy trophies and herself

Fell on the weeping brook."

Cowper says:

"We pass a gulf in which the willows dip

Their pendent boughs, stooping as if to drink."

Montgomery has also alluded to it:

"Odors abroad the winds of morning breathe

And fresh with dew, the herbage sprung beneath;

Down from the hills that gently sloped away

To the broad river shining into day

They passed; along the brink the path they kept

Where high aloof o'er-arching willows wept,

Whose silvery foliage glistened in the beam,

And floating shadows fringed the chequered stream."

And in Holy Writ we find: "By the rivers of Babylon, there we sat down: yea, we wept when we remembered Zion. We hanged our harps upon the willows in the midst thereof."

Every production of nature alluded to in the Bible is at once invested with a sacred character and possesses an indescribable interest. It is this which gives the willow a claim on our regard very far beyond what it might derive the graceful effect of its drooping boughs, or, indeed, from any other quality by which it is distinguished. At the Feast of Tabernacles, when, in commemoration of their fathers dwelling in tents during their forty year's sojourn in the wilderness, the Israelites were commanded to dwell in booths made of "goodly trees, and rejoice before the Lord their God seven days," those selected for the occasion were "branches of the palm trees and willows of the brook;" to which Nehemiah adds branches of olive, pine and myrtle. Those being all tied together with gold and silver strings, were carried in procession by the people during the feast. IRAS.

THE MEETING.

I MET her in the quiet lane
One Sabbath morning early;
The sun was bright, although the rain
Still glittered on the barley.
The lark was singing to his mate,
The wild bells chimed their warning,
We paused awhile outside the gate;
We lingered till it was too late
To go to church that morning!

Again we met. The whispering leaves
Glanced nigh in sight and shadow;
The reapers piled the yellow sheaves;
The bees humm'd o'er the meadow.
The royal sun rose up in state,
Our marriage-day adorning;
The bells rang out; wide stood the gate,
And neither of us was too late
To go to church that morning!

THE OLD CAMPAIGNER.

ON the twenty-fifth day of December, in the year one thousand eight hundred and thirty-five, three taps were lightly struck on the fourth-floor door of a house on the Me-gisserie quay at Paris, one of those tall and ugly tenements that seem to make cross faces down upon the waters of the Seine from morning till night, like so many antiquated and grinning buffoons. The three taps in question caused a young girl, who was seated alone inside the door to which they were applied, to start rather hurriedly from her seat, and to throw a piece of embroidery on the floor at her feet, believing sincerely, however, that she had put it on the chair beside her. Whether this arose from emotion at the announcement of an unexpected visit, or an expected one, will by and by appear; but, in the first place, it is necessary to tell who the damsel was, as the reader cannot be expected to take such interest as we could wish in one yet a stranger to him.

Pierre Bertrand, the father of Marie, was a splendid specimen of the old half-pay captain of the empire, such as that personage, or class of personages, became subsequently to the empire's fall. Rude and rough, though warm-hearted; retaining the moustache of the soldier, and all the soldier's habits, among which beer-drinking and smoking held so prominent a place, as to swallow almost half the pension; perpetually grumbling, yet continually jolly; enormously proud of various scars and cuts, and certain relics in the shape of crosses of honor, hacked sabres, and riddled uniforms; spending in telling old campaigning stories, and in playing at dominoes, all the time that was not spent in drinking and smoking; such was Pierre Bertrand, and such was his way of life. For his family, Pierre had, properly speaking, two children, although one only had a just claim of paternity upon him, as far as blood went. But for his having an adopted child, however, the old campaigner might never have had offspring of his own. On the field of battle, a dying comrade had consigned an infant boy to his arms, and Pierre had received the consignment with as much satisfaction and pride as others might receive a legacy of millions. It was to give this child a mother that Pierre had at first thought of marriage; and it chanced that the step, when he took it, only proved the means of bringing upon Pierre another dying legacy, his own little Mary. But the veteran bore up bravely under his burdens, and did his duty nobly by both his charges. To the boy, Jules, he contrived to give a good education, and six months before the period of our story—six months, in short, before the three taps at the door—Jules, then precisely twenty-three of years of age, had completed a course of legal studies, and had been entered a member of the bar of the Court Royal of Paris.

It was a proud day for the old captain when Jules donned the barrister's black cap and robe. Marie was the neigteen, as pretty a blue-eyed, merry-faced maiden as could be seen, with a heart warm and open as the sunny sky. Pierre had long settled in his own mind that his two "marmots," as he called them, should be married, and that the union should take place on the day that Jules pleaded his first cause. About the feelings of the parties themselves he had never thought much, and, in truth, they had given him no cause for any uneasiness on that score.

One day, immediately after Jules had passed the legal ordeal, old Bertrand was seated in his lofty, but neat, domicile, smoking silently and furiously, as he always did during any meditations of special importance, when a letter was brought to him. Letters were rare things with the veteran, and he looked long at the post-mark, which was that of his native province. Opening it finally, he read thus: "Sir, I hasten to announce to you the demise of M. Joseph Bertrand, your cousin german, proprietor of the foundry here. He has left a fortune valued at a million of francs. No direct heir presenting himself here on the paternal side, it is presunable that to you reverts the sum of 500,000 francs, the half of the whole succession, and which the law destines to that branch of the deceased's relatives. Of course, you will take the necessary steps to secure your rights." This epistle bore the signature of a provincial justice of peace, and gave other particulars of the case.

Bertrand was struck dumb for five minutes, and then broke out, by way of thankfulness, into a few of the common conversational phrases, which were composed of some three or four thousand bombs, one or two hundred pieces of cannon, and a proportionate number of thunders. "Five hundred thousand francs!" at length cried he; "Marie, my girl, read—read this. Read, my darling! Five hundred thousand francs! Yes, units, tens, hundreds, thousands, tens of thousands, hundreds of thousands! All right, Marie, my girl! Hurrah for the Emperor! Hurrah!" All was indeed right—and yet all proved not right in the end. Bertrand, soon after receiving the letter, set out for his native place, concluding that he had but to appear and take possession. But the collateral relations had taken advantage of his absence from the spot, and prepared unexpected obstacles for him. They had stirred and intrigued most actively, and had bought four or five consciences at some few thousand francs a-piece. In short, it was found that Bertrand could not establish his degree of relationship to the deceased. Certain extracts of birth and baptism, with other indispensable documents, could not be procured, notwithstanding the lengthened researches of the old clerk of the registry, to whom Bertrand gave five thousand francs to prove his titles—which sum, by the bye, in addition to twenty thousand received from the other side, made the affair a very profitable one for the old fox. The necessary documents, however, could not be found, and Pierre returned to Paris, totally disheartened, and smoking furiously.

Jules was the receptacle of the veteran's complaints. The young advocate was not slow to pronounce that chicanery and foguery must have been at work, and persuaded Pierre to pursue the matter at law. Within a few months the cause came on before the provincial court of B—. Jules, whose activity and researches had been unwearied, appeared for the first time as a pleader. While the case was going on, Marie Bertrand was in a state of feverish impatience. She knew not the issue on the evening of the twenty-fifth day of December, 1835. It was then she heard three taps at the door of her father's dwelling, and started from her seat to open it.

Jules entered. Marie sat down on her chair in silence, after one glance at his countenance, which wore a downcast expression. "You have lost the cause then, Jules?" she said at length. "No, Marie, it is gained; you are rich," was the reply. The damsel raised her eyes in surprise, and exclaimed, "Gained! What then means this—this—" Jules interrupted her. "Marie, I quit Paris this evening, and I come to bid you farewell. You will be wealthy and happy! Yes, I go—but you will think of me sometimes, will you not?"

The young girl looked at Jules to see if he spoke seriously, and was stunned to behold his eyes filled with tears. At this moment Bertrand entered. Jules went up to him, and placing a massive pocket-book in his hands, said, "My kind friend, justice has been done you; here are five hundred bank-notes, of 1,000 francs each—the part of your cousin's heritage which fell to you, and which I received, as authorized by you."

Bertrand looked at the papers, which Jules displayed to him; then the veteran looked at Marie, who was struggling to hide her tears; and finally, he looked at the pale face of Jules. "Why, what is this about?" cried he. "Why do you weep, Marie? Why do I not find you happy and joyful at such a moment? Jules, what have you been saying? Won't you answer me? Marie! Jules! By the thunder, there is something here! Marie, girl, tell me why you weep!"

The veteran's daughter made a desperate effort to compose herself. "He is going away, father," said she; "he departs this evening—he quits us—through pride, perhaps. He loved us while we were poor, but does so no more, since we have become rich." After this effort, Marie laid her head on her father's shoulder, and wept more than ever.

"I hope, Jules," said Bertrand, "that you will explain this. May I be shot if I understand a word of what this little whimperer means." "My father," replied Jules, "I depart this night." "You depart—ah, well—how long will you be away?" was Pierre's answer. "A long time, father," said the young man, "a long time—for ever, perhaps! You have nurtured me, you have given me a place and station in life—I ought to be no more a charge to you. I leave Paris—" "Jules, you are insane!" returned the old soldier. "Quit Paris! and at this moment above all others, when you have won a cause that will ring through the courts! It is folly, and I don't comprehend it. Besides, it is impossible that you can go away. I have arranged matters otherwise."

Marie gently raised her head, and cast on her father a look so sweet, that Jules felt himself enfeebled by the influence.

"Yes," continued Bertrand, "I have had my plans arranged, and for a long time, too. Only, I thought I could bestow on you nought but the pearl; but you shall now have the setting along with it, my lad. It won't do you any harm, will it, to have twenty-five thousand livres a year to keep you going? Come, it is settled. Embrace him, Marie; I am pleased with him. Come, and let us off directly to the notary!"

"My father, it is impossible!" cried Jules, in accents which proved the struggle he was undergoing. "It is impossible! Already do my friends, the court, all Paris, declare that my labors, my researches, my journeyings, have all been for this money! Oh, Marie! pardon me—I love you! Yes, I love you to idolatry! But were you now to be my wife, all men would point their finger at me, as one who would not take the poor girl, but snatched at the rich heiress—snatched at her, as soon as she had become so, and ere she could have an opportunity to see other suitors, more worthy her condition, at her feet. Oh, why did I gain this cause!"

Jules was proceeding in this passionate strain, when Bertrand, who had, in the meantime, taken the pocket-book into his hands, brought the young advocate to a pause, by thus addressing him: "It is, then, this parcel of papers which renders you so scrupulous, my boy? It is, then, this bundle of stuff," continued he, holding up the pocket-book, "that prevents you wedding my little girl? Ah; well, young man, I admire your delicacy. But I will not be less generous than you!" So speaking, old Pierre turned to the window, which he had previously opened, and with all the force of a vigorous arm, cast the valuable pocket-book far out into the deep and muddy waters of the Seine!

Bertrand then turned from the window, and showing one single bank-note to the astonished and thunderstruck youth, observed coolly to him, "I have kept but this one thousand francs, you see; it will serve for the expenses of the nuptials; for you will not draw back now, Jules!" He continued in a severe tone—"A few moments ago, my daughter was rich, immensely rich, and you refused her hand—like a madman, I must say. She is now poor as yourself, for I know she would have been miserable with riches which she could not share with you. To-morrow you will marry her if you are a man of honor. If not—but I shall leave you together. Marie will inform me of your reply." Bertrand then left the room, shutting the door behind him with a shock that betokened an angry excitement of mind in the old campaigner. But after all, the recent loss of fortune seemed not long to trouble the veteran, as, on sitting down soon after to a game of dominoes with a boon companion, the latter declared he had never seen Pierre so merry in all their intercourse, or so given to burst into peals of laughter on the slightest incitement.

Jules was completely staggered by Bertrand's act, but, when left alone with Marie, he soon recovered. The sensibility of the young advocate to the public voice was no affected sentiment, nor was his love for Marie; and the pair speedily pledged themselves to each other, hand and heart. They sat long together, yet Bertrand considerably staid out of the way, and ere he returned, Jules had departed. It would be peering too curiously, perhaps, into poor, weak human nature, to ask if Jules did not cast a self-reproachful glance into the Seine that night as he passed it on his way homewards. If he did look wistfully on the waters, however, the future comforts, to do him justice, of Marie and her father formed the cause of his feelings at the moment. The case was hopeless at all events. A hundred years' dragging might not have brought up that book from those deep and muddy waters.

The nuptials of Jules and Marie took place a day or two after these events. Bertrand took upon himself the ordering of the marriage-festival, and he made it so splendid a one, that the single bank-note of the heritage must have deeply felt the inroad. All the friends of the family were present; and amongst them, a minority at least of the gentlemen were deficient in some prominent member of the body, from the nose to the right limb. But the defects of these friends of the veteran were honorably compensated by medals, and crosses and other badges of renown. After dinner, an enormous cold tart, or pie, which Pierre publicly declared to be a new dish of his own invention, was produced with the dessert. All eyes were turned to the dish, the task of opening which fell to the pretty hands of the bride. Marie blushing began the duty, but her first incision fell upon a hard substance, which made her declare her father's fine dish to consist of something totally indivisible and indigestible. "Ah, ha!" cried Pierre, triumphantly, "cut it out!" Marie did so, and the company beheld a new red morocco pocket-book, well stuffed and marked with gilded letters with the words, "Four hundred and ninety-nine thousand francs."

Pierre roared with rapture and delight, as well he might. The sly old campaigner had thrown into the Seine nothing but the worthless old pocket-book!

Jules did not require his worthy father-in-law's laughter to tell him what meant the pocket-book in the pie. As soon as it was brought out, and the lettering read, the veteran's ruse was clear. Jules now enjoys his twenty-five thousand livres of rent, and loves his wife as much as if she had only brought him her heart for a dowry. As to his scruples, he now says he ought to have been glad to get Marie, although she had been a queen.

Jules is at this day a distinguished and honored advocate.

At a station on the overland route the keeper got rather short of provisions—in fact, had nothing left but a bottle of mustard and some bacon. As the stage stopped there one day to change horses, the passengers seated themselves at the table, and the host said: "Shall I help you to a piece of bacon?" "No, thank you; I never eat bacon," said one traveller. "Well, then," said the station-keeper, "help yourself to the mustard!"

THE HIGHLAND LIGHT.

THIS lighthouse, known to mariners as the Cape Cod or Highland Light, is one of our primary sea-coast lights, and is usually the first seen by those approaching the entrance of Massachusetts Bay from Europe. It is forty-three miles from Cape Ann Light, and forty-one from Boston Light. It stands about twenty rods from the edge of the bank, which is here formed of clay. I borrowed the plane and square, level and dividers, of a carpenter who was shingling a barn near by, and using one of those shingles made of a mast, contrived a rude sort of quadrant, with pins for sights and pivots, and got the angle of elevation of the Bank opposite the lighthouse, and with a couple of clod-lines the length of its slope, and so measured its height on the shingle. It rises one hundred and ten feet above its immediate base, or about one hundred and twenty-three feet above mean low water. Graham, who has carefully surveyed the extremity of the Cape, makes it one hundred and thirty feet. The mixed sand and clay lay at an angle of forty degrees with the horizon, where I measured it, but the clay is generally much steeper. No cow nor hen ever gets down it. Half a mile farther south the bank is fifteen or twenty-five feet higher, and that appeared to be the highest land in North Truro. Even this vast clay bank is fast wearing away. Small streams of water trickling down it at intervals of two or three rods, have left the intermediate clay in the form of steep Gothic roofs fifty feet high or more, the ridges as sharp and rugged-looking as rocks; and in one place the bank is curiously eaten out in the form of a large semi-circular crater.

According to the lighthouse keeper, the Cape is wasting here on both sides, though most on the eastern. In some places it had lost many rods within the last year, and, ere-long, the lighthouse must be moved. We calculated, from his data, how soon the Cape would be quite worn away at this point, "for," said he, "I can remember sixty years back." We were even more surprised at this last announcement—that is, at the slow waste of life and energy in our informant, for we had taken him to be not more than forty—than at the rapid waste of the Cape, and we thought that he stood a fair chance to outlive the former.

Between this October and June of the next year, I found that the bank had lost about forty feet in one place, opposite the lighthouse, and it was cracked more than forty feet farther from the edge at the last date, the shore being strewn with the recent rubbish. But I judged that generally it was not wearing away here at the rate of more than six feet annually. Any conclusions drawn from the observations of a few years or one generation only are likely to prove false, and the Cape may balk expectation by its durability. In some places even a wrecker's footpath down the bank lasts several years. One old inhabitant told us that when the lighthouse was built, in 1798, it was calculated that it would stand forty-five years, allowing the bank to waste one length of fence each year, "but," said he, "there it is," (or rather another near the same site, about twenty rods from the edge of the bank.)

The sea is not gaining on the Cape everywhere, for one man told me of a vessel wrecked long ago on the north of Provincetown whose "bones" (this was his word) are still visible many rods within the present line of the beach, half-buried in sand. Perchance alongside the timbers of a whale. The general statement of the inhabitants is, that the Cape is wasting on both sides, but extending itself on particular points on the south and west, as at Chatham and Monomoy Beaches, and at Billingsgate, Long, and Race Points. James Freeman stated in his day that above three miles had been added to Monomoy Beach during the previous fifty years, and it is said to be still extending as fast as ever. A writer in the Massachusetts Magazine, in the last century, tells that "when the English first settled upon the Cape, there was an island off Chatham, at three leagues' distance, called Webbs' Island, containing twenty acres, covered with red-cedar or savin. The inhabitants of Nantucket used to carry wood from it;" but he adds that in his day a large rock alone marked the spot, and the water was six fathoms deep there. The entrance to Nauset Harbor, which was once in Eastham, has now travelled south into Orleans. The islands in Wellfleet harbor once formed a continuous beach, though now small vessels pass between them. And so of many other parts of this coast.

Perhaps what the ocean takes from one part of the Cape it gives to another—robs Peter to pay Paul. On the eastern side the sea appears to be everywhere encroaching on the land. Not only the land is undermined, and its ruins carried off by currents, but the sand is blown from the beach directly up the steep bank where it is one hundred and fifty feet high, and covers the original surface there many feet deep. If you sit on the edge you will have ocular demonstration of this by soon getting your eyes full. Thus the bank preserves its height as fast as it is worn away. This sand is steadily travelling westward at a rapid rate, "more than a hundred yards," says one writer, within the memory of inhabitants now living; so that in some places peat-meadow has made its appearance on the shore in the bank covered many feet deep, and peat has been cut there. This accounts for that great pebble of peat which we saw in the surf. The old oysterman had told us that many years ago he lost a "crittur" by her being mired in a swamp near the Atlantic side east of his house, and twenty years ago he lost the swamp itself entirely, but has since seen signs of it appearing on the beach. He also said that he had seen cedar stumps "as big as cartwheels" (!) on the bottom of the Bay, three miles off Billingsgate Point, when leaning over the side of his boat in pleasant weather, and that that was dry land not long ago. Another told us that a log canoe known to have been buried many years before on the Bay side at East Harbor in Truro, where the Cape is extremely narrow, appeared at length on the Atlantic side, the Cape having rolled over it, and an old woman said: "Now, you see, it is true what I told you, that the Cape is moving."

The bars along the coast shift with every storm, and in many places there is occasionally none at all. We ourselves observed the effect of a single storm with a high tide in the night, in July, 1855. It moved the sand on the beach opposite the lighthouse to the depth of six feet, and three rods in width as far as we could see north and south, and carried it bodily off no one knows exactly where, laying bare, in one place, a large rock five feet high, which was invisible before, and narrowing the beach to that extent. There is usually, as I have said, no bathing on the backside of the Cape, on account of the undertow, but when we were there last, the sea had, three months before, cast up a bar near this lighthouse, two miles long and ten rods wide, over which the sea did not flow, leaving a narrow cove, then a quarter of a mile long, between it and the shore, which afforded excellent bathing. This cove had from time to time been closed up as the bar travelled northward, in one instance imprisoning four or five hundred whiting and cod, which died there, and the water as often turned fresh and finally gave place to sand. This bar, the inhabitants assured us, might be wholly removed, and the water six feet deep there in two or three days.

The lighthouse keeper said that when the wind blew strong on to the shore, the waves ate fast into the bank, but when it blew off they took no sand away; for in the former case the wind heaped up the surface of the water next to the beach, and to preserve its equilibrium a strong undertow immediately set back again into the sea which carried with it the sand and whatever else was in the way, and left the beach hard to walk on; but in the latter case the undertow set on, and carried the sand with it, so that it was particularly difficult for shipwrecked men to get to land when the wind blew on to the shore, but easier when it blew off. This undertow, meeting the next surface wave on the bar which itself has made, forms part of the dam over which the latter breaks, as over an upright wall. The sea thus plays with the land, holding a sand-bar in its mouth awhile before it swallows it, as a cat plays with a mouse; but the fatal gripe is sure to come at last. The sea sends its rapacious east wind to rob the land, but before the former has got far with its prey, the land sends its honest west wind to recover some of its own. But, according to Lieutenant Davis, the forms, extent and distribution of sand bars and banks are principally determined, not by winds and waves, but by tides.

Our host said that you would be surprised if you were on the beach when the wind blew a hurricane directly on to it, to see that none of the driftwood came ashore, but all was carried directly northward and parallel with the shore as fast as a man can walk, by the inshore current, which sets strongly in that direction at flood tide. The strongest swimmers also are carried along with it, and never gain an inch toward the beach. Even a large rock has been moved half a mile northward along the beach. He assured us that the sea was never still on the back side of the Cape, but ran commonly as high as your head, so that a great part of the time you could not launch a boat there, and even in the calmest weather the waves run six or eight feet up the beach, though then you could get off on a plank. Champlain and Pourtrecourt could not land here in 1606, on account of the swell, (la houle), yet the savages came off to them in a canoe. In the Sieur de la Borde's Relation des Caraïbes, my edition of which was published at Amsterdam in 1711, at page 530, he says:

"Couromon, a Caraïbe, also a star, [i. e., a god,] makes the great lames a la mer, and overturns canoes. Lames a la mer are the long vagues which are not broken, (entrecoûpées), and such as one sees come to land all in one piece, from one end of a beach to another, so that, however little wind there may be, a shallop or a canoe could hardly land (aborder terre) without turning over or being filled with water."

But on the Bay side the water, even at its edge, is often as smooth and still as in a pond. Commonly there are no boats used along this beach. There was a boat belonging to the Highland Light which the next keeper after he had been there a year had not launched, though he said that there was good fishing just off the shore. Generally the life-boats cannot be used when needed. When the waves run very high it is impossible to get a boat off, however skillfully you steer it, for it will often be completely covered by the curving edge of the approaching breaker as by an arch, and so filled with water, or it will be lifted up by its bows, turned directly over backwards and all the contents spilled out. A spar thirty feet long is served in the same way.

I heard of a party who went off fishing back of Wellfleet some years ago, in two boats, in calm weather, who, when they had laden their boats with fish, and approached the land again, found such a swell breaking on it, though there was no wind, that they were afraid to enter it. At first they thought to pull for Provincetown, but night was coming on, and that was many miles distant. Their case seemed a desperate one. As often as they approached the shore and saw the terrible breakers that intervened, they were deterred. In short, they were thoroughly frightened. Finally, having thrown their fish overboard, those in one boat chose a favorable opportunity, and succeeded, by skill and good luck, in reaching the land, but they were unwilling to take the responsibility of telling the others when to come in, and as the other helmsman was inexperienced, their boat was swamped at once, yet all managed to save themselves.

We read that the Clay Ponds were so called, "because vessels have had the misfortune to be pounded against it in gales of wind," which we regard as a doubtful derivation. There are small ponds here, upheld by the clay, which were formerly called the Clay Pits. Perhaps this, or Clay Ponds, is the origiu of the name. Water is found in the clay quite near the surface; but we heard of one man who had sunk a well in the sand close by, "till he could see stars at noonday," without finding any. Over this bare Highland the wind has full sweep. Even in July it blows the wings over the heads of the young turkeys, which do not know enough to head against it; and in gales the doors and windows are blown in, and you must hold on to the lighthouse to prevent being blown into the Atlantic. They who merely keep out on the beach in a storm in the winter are sometimes rewarded by the Humane Society. If you would feel the full force of a tempest, take up your residence on the top of Mount Washington, or at the Highland Light, in Truro.

It was said in 1794 that more vessels were cast away on the east shore of Truro than anywhere in Barnstable county. Notwithstanding that this lighthouse has since been erected, after almost every storm we read of one or more vessels wrecked here, and sometimes more than a dozen wrecks are visible from this point at one time. The inhabitants hear the crash of vessels going to pieces as they sit round their hearths, and they commonly date from some memorable shipwreck. If the history of this beach could be written from beginning to end, it would be a thrilling page in the history of commerce.

In the year 1717, a noted pirate named Bellamy was led on to the bar off Wellfleet by the captain of a scow which he had taken, to whom he had offered his vessel again if he would pilot him into Provincetown harbor. Tradition says that the latter threw over a burning tar-barrel in the night, which drifted ashore, and the pirates followed it. A storm coming on, their whole fleet was wrecked, and more than a hundred dead bodes lay along the shore. Six who escaped shipwreck were executed. "At times to this day," (1793,) says the historian of Wellfleet, "there are King William and Queen Mary's coppers picked up, and pieces of silver called cob-money. The violence of the seas moves the sands on the outer bar, so that at times the iron caboose of the ship, [that is, Bellamy's,] at low ebbs has been seen." Another tells us that, "For many years after this shipwreck, a man of a very singular and frightful aspect used every spring and autumn to be seen travelling on the Cape, who was supposed to have been one of Bellamy's crew. The presumption is that he went to some place where money had been secreted by the pirates, to get such a supply as his exigencies required. When he died, many pieces of gold were found in a girdle which he constantly wore."—Thoreau's Cape Cod.

NAPOLEON AND THE MUSICAL CLOCK.—On one of the nights that Napoleon spent at Charlotteburg, during his campaign in Germany, his slumber was disturbed. In Frederick William's dining-room close to the conqueror's bedchamber, there stood a large musical clock, which admirably imitated a band of trumpets. At midnight the row began; trumpets echoed through the palace; the servants, the adjutants, Napoleon himself, leaped out of bed, and every one believed it a surprise. But soon everything was quiet again, and no one could make out where the trumpets were. Sentinels were posted, a part of the adjutants remained up, and at one o'clock there was the same row again, this time in one of the rooms. They rushed in, and the innocent clock was detached before the tune was ended. Napoleon the Great, the destroyer of the Prussian monarchy, sleeping in the palace of the Queen of Prussia, and frightened by a musical clock!

THERE is a hotel in Springfield that only charges half-price for lovers; and yet the proprietor says he makes more money out of this class of boarders than any other people about the house. "Let a youth," he says, "set up with a yellow spencer and blue eyes on Sunday night, and he will feel so heavenly that he won't get down to pork and beans again till the latter part of the week."

RETRIBUTIONS OF THE WAR.

WE doubt if the history of any nation can show as perfect illustrations of poetical retribution as have been slowly but surely developed during the progress of the war. The mind of poet could hardly imagine a denouement to some fanciful history of crime and wrong that could express such perfect compensation and retribution as that which Providence has meted out to the authors and abettors of the rebellion. Charleston, the cradle of the slaveholder's conspiracy, which was to be razed to the ground before the foot of the Yankee vandal should profane its soil, was quietly taken possession of by a negro regiment. The first men to enter its streets were the freed soldiers of the old despised race, placed in the front, and who, as it were, accepted the submission of the masters who had for years oppressed them. The flag of Fort Sumter, lowered amid the jeers and bravado of a "superior race," was four years after lifted to its place by the same commander who had saved it from dishonor, with "mercenary hirelings" standing by, and Henry Ward Beecher (above all men the hated adversary of slavery, for whose blood the South had thirsted,) addressing the multitude beneath its folds, and breathing a spirit of forgiveness and good will to the men who listened and applauded. Had the assassin of the President been subjected to those refinements of torture which the middle ages decreed the traitor, he could not have suffered greater physical anguish than physicians have declared must have been the effect of the chance shot of his captor. During the funeral procession of the President through the streets of New York, the negroes, who two years ago were hunted like wild beasts through the same thoroughfares, were applauded and cheered till their progress was, in the words of the chronicler, "a perfect ovation." The corn which, to feed Jeff Davis' army, by his edict supplanted the usual crop of cotton, fed the soldiers of Sherman in his march through Georgia. The slaves, familiar through hardships and pursuit with the swamps and morasses, piloted the Northern armies by paths and trails unknown to none but themselves and the bloodhounds that of old pursued them. Lastly, we have the representative of Southern Chivalry—the high-minded and lofty souled leader of the rebellion, the idol of European eyes, the incarnation of desperate and unyielding valor, condemned by the same inexorable law of compensation to run away from his army, to be branded as an assassin without a chance of exhibiting the assassin's reckless courage, to be finally taken in women's petticoats, and to querulously chide the soldiers who captured him with not according to him the courtesy which belonged to his assumed sex. What greater exhibition could an indignant and long-suffering people ask than this? Into what more ridiculous postures could the wheel of fortune have thrown these men who had assumed the romantic and heroic attitude before mankind? Verily, the mills of the gods grind slowly, but they grind exceeding fine.

THE U. S. 7-30 LOAN.—Jay Cooke, Subscription Agent of the 7-30 Loan, telegraphs that he has commenced issuing the third series of the $230,000,000 called for. These bonds are precisely like the others, except that they are dated July 15th, and Government reserves the right to pay six per cent. in gold instead of 7-30 in currency. As there is every prospect that the bonds will soon command a handsome premium, the Loan offers a good opportunity for investment. The people of the East appreciate it and are availing themselves of its advantages with eagerness. Perhaps, also, patriotic pride has something to do with their action in the matter. Does it furnish no incentive to our people? We hope to hear of a call for these bonds in California, soon, which will exhaust the $4,000,000 allotted to our citizens.

THE present number of this paper terminates its second volume. The prospects of THE CALIFORNIAN have steadily brightened, and no effort will be spared to maintain its present pre-eminence in popular favor.

We acknowledge the receipt of an invitation to a social party of the State Guard, given last evening, at their armory, No. 729 Market street.

NEW BOOKS.

WE have received the following books from A. Roman & Co., 417 and 419 Montgomery street:

Poems. By R. W. Emerson. 12mo. pp. 254. Boston: Ticknor & Fields. 1865.

The blue-and-gold edition of Emerson's poems contains nothing of later date than the previous volume issued by Ticknor & Fields. Yet in its more convenient and portable size it seems to claim greater popularity, and is brought into closer and more familiar relations to the reader. Those who admire more melodious versification and finely-woven fancies and sentiments, may find little to attract them in these rugged monoliths which Mr. Emerson has set up for us to wonder and marvel at in this volume, and which often speak as mysteriously and require as much interpretation as the obelisks of Egypt, or the monuments of Stonehenge. But as the familiar contemplation of these latter wonders serve to impress us with their true sublimity and meaning, so a closer inspection brings out the grandeur and moral beauty of our poet, and makes even the apparent discord of his numbers approximate to harmony. The well-known "Threnody" upon the death of his son closes the book. Though we have already copied freely from this volume, we are tempted to make the following extract from that beautiful poem:

Ah, vainly do these eyes recall
The school-march, each day's festival,
When every morn my bosom glowed
To watch the convoy on the road;
The babe in willow wagon closed,
With rolling eyes and face composed:
With children forward and behind,
Like Cupids studiously inclined;
And he the chieftain paced beside,
The centre of the troop allied,
With sunny face of sweet repose,
To guard the babe from fancied foes.
The little captain innocent
Took the eye with him as he went;
Each village senior paused to scan
And speak the lovely caravan.
From the widow I look out
To mark thy beautiful parade,
Stately marching in cap and coat
To some tune by fairies played;
A music heard by thee alone
To works as noble led thee on.
Now Love and Pride, alas! in vain,
Up and down their glances strain.
The painted sled stands where it stood;
The kennel by the corded wood;
The gathered sticks to stanch the wall
Of the snow-tower, when snow should fall,
The ominous hole he dug in the sand,
And childhood's castles built or planned:
His daily haunts I well discern—
The poultry-yard, the shed, the barn—
And every inch of garden ground
Paced by the blessed feet around,
From the roadside to the brook
Whereinto he loved to look.
Step the meek birds where erst they ranged;
The wintry garden lies unchanged;
The brook into the stream runs on;
But the deep-eyed boy is gone.

The essence of all that is pure or noble in Mr. Emerson's philosophy is contained in the following lines:

The eager fate which carried thee
Took the largest part of me.
For this losing is true dying;
This is lordly man's down lying,
This his slow but sure reclining,
Star by star his world resigning.

Cape Cod. By Henry D. Thoreau. 16mo. pp. 252. Boston: Ticknor & Fields. 1865.

There is a breezy atmosphere about this book which is quite as invigorating to the reader, during this languid spring weather, as a stroll along one of those sea beaches which Mr. Thoreau has so capably described. He seems to have also thoroughly mastered the mysterious language of the sea-shore, and to have interpreted it to us in a style which mingles with his deep admiration for nature less misanthropy than is his custom. His philosophy is enlivened by pleasant satire here and there, and his pictures of nature are very graphic. Nobody but Thoreau would have thought of rambling up and down this sandy cape in a rain storm, and nobody else could have succeeded in making a book upon it so original and entertaining. Everybody knows where Cape Cod is, but very few, we venture to predict, ever thought of it in the connection suggested by this paragraph:

"Cape Cod is the bared and bended arm of Massachusetts; the shoulder is at Buzzard's Bay; the elbow, or crazy-bone, at Cape Mallebarre; the wrist at Truro; and the sandy fist at Provincetown—behind which the State stands on her guard, with her back to the Green Mountains, and her feet planted on the floor of the ocean, like an athlete protecting her Bay—boxing with north-east storms, and, ever and anon, heaving up her Atlantic adversary from the lap of earth,—ready to thrust forward her other fist, which keeps guard the while upon her breast at Cape Ann."

We have given a more extended extract in another column.

Lorrimer Littlegood. By Frank E. Smedley, author of "Frank Fairleigh," etc. 8vo. pp. 322. Philadelphia: T. B. Peterson & Co.

Lorrimer Littlegood belongs to the light-comedy-and-genteel-farce school of novel founded by Mr. Smedley, and of which Frank Fairleigh is the best example. The objection to this style is that it is not entirely free from certain theatrical gagging and slang, and sometimes becomes careless and slovenly. Mr. Smedley's books, however, are replete with funny "situations" and practical jokes. The preternaturally sharp valet of the modern farce, and the rollicking young Oxonian, his master, whose vices are relieved by gleams of moral principle—too often the least interesting feature in his character to the general reader—are the heroes who walk through his novels. Lorrimer Littlegood contains all these distinguishing peculiarities. It is the history of a good-natured but vain young spendthrift, who runs through a small patrimony in a fashion that is highly entertaining to the reader, whose moral judgment is appeased by the hero's coming out all right at the end of the last chapter.

Social Statics; or, the Conditions essential to Human Happiness Specified, and the First of them Developed. By Herbert Spencer, author of "Illustrations of Progress," etc. 8vo. pp. 523. New York: D. Appleton & Co. 1865.

An American edition of a well-known English work.

Mr. C. Beach, 34 Montgomery street, has laid on our table A Pastoral Address by the Bishop of Honolulu, which seems to be a reply to certain animadversions of the Rev. R. Anderson, D. D., in his work entitled The Hawaiian Islands. Copies of the address are for sale by Mr. Beach.

MUSICAL MATTERS.

VERDI'S Rigoletto was given by Maguire's Italian Opera troupe at the Academy of Music, on Tuesday evening. The plot taken from Victor Hugo's Le Roi s'amuse, is intensely dramatic, and the role of the jester "Rigoletto," played by Orlando, was a severe test of his powers as a good buffo and melo-dramatic artist. Perhaps his athletic proportions somewhat militated against the effect of the jester's antics and gambols, but he overcame these physical impediments by careful acting. Miss Phillips, whose role of "Madeline," did not bring her upon the stage until the last act, contrived nevertheless, to win her usual crowning chaplet. She looked very pretty in her coquettish costume, and acted with consummate ability, while her rich, full, sympathetic voice satisfied the ear. "The Duke," (Spriglia,) sang with considerable ability, and rendered the famous "Donna e mobile" very creditably. Il Poliuto was given on Thursday evening, and was very fairly rendered. The audience, though not as large as on former occasions, were very demonstrative in their appreciation, and called the principal actors before the curtain. The getting up of these operas, and the drilling of the choruses, (who are very good,) reflect great credit on Mr. Rieff, under whose management the troupe have performed labors and achieved successes that might almost seem impossible for the time employed in rehearsal.

Gottschalk's matinée of last Saturday was well attended. The programme was the same as his first performance. On Monday evening his third grand concert was given at the Academy, with what we thought were improvements on his previous selections. An andante from Beethoven's "Sonata Pathétique," and Chopin's "Prelude Religious," were most noticeable and were beautifully rendered. Miss Simons sang "La Boubonnaise," from Auber's Manon Lescaut, with excellent execution; also an original waltz by Gottschalk, composed for this lady, entitled "La Californienne." Another matinée was given at the Academy on Wednesday. Mr. Gottschalk's audiences, though comparatively good, are not overflowing, nor are they enthusiastic, nor do they seem to actively demonstrate their appreciation of the genius of this extraordinary composer and performer. The opportunity they have is one rarely vouchsafed to them, and it is due to the merit of Mr. Gottschalk and their own reputation for musical taste, to bestow upon this first-class artist some of the practical commendation which they boisterously exhibit for inferior ability. While on this topic we are reminded of a paragraph in regard to this gentleman, which appears in the New York correspondence of Dwight's Journal of Music:

"Gottschalk has left us, after a few concerts d'adieu, which were of course highly appreciated and largely attended by his admirers. Accompanied by Signor and Madame Muzio, he proposes making a visit to California, British India, the Mauritias, Polynesia, New Zealand, China, Japan, and who knows where? Let us hope he will find more appreciation in those regions than did Mr. Charles Wehle, the German pianist, whose spirituelle letters from thence were so instructively, interestingly, but by no means (to musical voyageurs) inducively written."

Gounod's Faust was the opening opera of Bianchi's second season on Wednesday night, as well as the first performance of this musical novelty on this coast. With a few exceptions—a waltz and the well-known march—the music of this opera was unfamiliar to a majority of the audience, and although a very popular opera in Europe, they did not seem to appreciate it, and were cautious in their commendation. The first act suggests the incantation music of Von Weber's Der Freischütz. The artists were not quite up in their parts, and some discord in the choruses, which was observable, was probably owing to the difficulties attending a first representation. The military march and chorus, a striking but by no means the most artistic feature of the opera, were loudly encored. The scenic effects were excellent, although some odd mistakes happened in the first performance. The dissolving vision of "Marguerite" which Mephistopheles shows to Faust, was somewhat marred by the introduction of half a scene from the pantomime of Mother Goose, representing the exterior of a Ladies' Bathing Establishment. Morrelli's "Mephistopheles" was very good, but the other characters cannot be fairly criticised under the circumstances. Morley's hoarseness seemed to have returned. The opera was repeated last evening, but too late for a notice in this issue.

As the only published "Arguments" of Faust are exceedingly long, we have endeavored to condense it, as follows:

MARGARET had yellow hair,
And a taste for jewelry;
So a chain she used to wear,
Given to her by the D.

She loved Faust, whose beard was curled,
But who once, when he was vexed,
Sold for profit in this world
All his prospects in the next.

When the post obits were due,
Faust and Margaret and chain
Naturally reverted to Mephistopheles again.

And the moral of this tale,
Told by Goethe and Gounod,
Is: The profits of the sale,
With the soul, belong below.

STORIES FOR LITTLE GIRLS.

I HAVE noticed with some indignation a tendency, in the popular stories of childhood, to give all the heroic enterprises to boys, and to utterly ignore girls as adventurous heroines. As daughters predominate in my own family, I humbly protest against their being put off with such feeble notoriety as "Cinderella" affords them, or such doubtful fame as belongs to "Little Red Riding Hood." Firmly believing in the superior energy, tact and invention of the sex, I consider the latter story of a wolf deceiving a little girl by personating her grandmother, as the puerile invention of some envious old bachelor, and have felt a consciousness of imbecility in reading it aloud to young ladies, any one of whom I am satisfied would have detected Mr. Wolf in his first hypocritical sentence. As to Cinderella, we all know she had no interest except that conferred on her by the Prince. In point of fact, Contrairy Mary seems to have been the only young lady in childish fiction, who is recorded to have had any independence of character; but even here the masculine chronicler, by simply stating the fact of "contrarieness" without explanation, unfairly leaves us to suppose that it was of a purposeless and ineffective quality.

Not content with merely lifting my voice against this injustice, I am convinced that if I have any particular mission, it is to fill this void in the literature of children. The ages have waited for this event, and childish fingers, among which the thumb of Jack Horner appears pre-eminent, point to me as the man. I shall not shrink from the appointed task. A shrill chorus of infantine voices applaud my resolution, and with fingers trembling with excitement, I dash into my first effort which is

THE STORY OF MISS MARY CRUSOE.

At the age of fifteen, Miss Mary Crusoe undertook a voyage to the South Pacific to visit her desolate aunt, whose husband, a worthy missionary, had lately furoished, in his own person, food and raiment for the benighted islanders. As he did not survive this Christian act, Miss Crusoe's aunt sent for her niece to relieve her increasing loneliness. The voyage had been quite prosperous, but one day a terrific storm came on, and the vessel struck on a rock. Miss Crusoe was the only one that escaped. Buoyed up by her crinoline on a monstrous wave, she was washed on a desert island where she lay for a few moments insensible.

When she recovered her senses, she rose and carefully removed her stockings and spread them on a rock to dry. For a moment she regretted not having brought a change with her from the ship—but a sense of gratitude to Providence for her deliverance checked the foolish thought. She then made a tour of the island, meeting only a few crabs on the beach, who turned quite red at the spectacle of her bare little ankles, and walked away holding their claws before their eyes. But Miss Crusoe did not despair. Finding one of the ship's sails on the beach, she drew a housewife from her bosom, and taking a needle and scissors therefrom, in a very short time made and fitted to her pretty figure a coarse but neat morning wrapper, which she fastened around her waist with the bolt ropes. Having lost her comb in the surf, her back hair came down. A rusty spike which she picked from a portion of the wreck served her for a hair-pin, and the seaweed which still clung to it added ornament to the coiffure. As Miss Mary glanced at her reflection in a pool of water beside her, a pleasurable blush untailed her cheek at the becoming effect of her costume. But she sighed at the thought that there was no other human eye to behold it.

With a broom made of dried boughs and leaves fastened to a piece of bamboo, Miss Mary swept away the sand from the leeward-side of a large rock so as to form a comfortable couch. This she draped with fragments of the old sail, and saying her prayers like a good girl, laid down her fair head on a sandy pillow, and presently fell asleep. The moon came up, and touching the little island here and there with silver radiance, out of respect to Miss Mary's modesty, left her sleeping place in shadow. The waves talked in whispers so as to not to disturb her, and the sea-breeze sang a pleasant lullaby. So passed the first day in the island.

The next morning, after a careful toilette and a breakfast of wild grapes, which grew plentifully on the rocks beside her, Miss Mary hastened to the beach. Here she found the sea had providentially washed ashore from the wreck the following articles: A tea-kettle and canister of tea, a bottle of Eau de Cologne, a set of crochet needles, a few pounds of worsted, some tape, a guitar, an assortment of hair-pins, and a box of matches. [If any objection be made to this list as improbable, I point to the masculine inventory of Robinson Crusoe's spoils as a precedent.] After making a cup of tea, Miss Mary confessed she felt better, and at once began the construction of that bower which for years afterward formed her residence on the island. In this she was assisted only by her needle, thread and scissors. The climate was miraculously mild, and admitted of the lightest material for building purposes. A wild kid which Miss Mary caught during this week, was of some service to her as a household pet; this family was afterward increased by two caoaries, a pet field-mouse and a jarboe. Not having the slightest idea what this latter animal may be, I am unable to describe it. It is peculiar to desert islands I am told.

But even these companions failed to give Miss Mary suitable society. Her domestic duties were growing exceedingly onerous. She was in despair, and her young cheek grew pale and thin. One day, while walking on the beach at the extremity of the island, she perceived a foot-print in the sand. It was of a female gaiter of a large size, evidently a No. 10, while Miss Mary wore a 2½, narrow. There could be no mistake; some other woman had trodden the lonely shore. When Miss Mary had recovered from the shock of her surprise, she deliberated calmly. With feminine quickness she reasoned that it would be impossible for two women to live on equal terms together on a desert island. Some one must dominate. Miss Mary, with a determined shake of her pretty head, made up her mind who that one should be. The next day the beach was strewn with fragments of a wreck, and she discovered that an emigrant ship from Ireland to Australia had gone ashore upon the fatal rocks. Providence again smiled kindly on Mary Crusoe. She encountered the mysterious castaway, who proved to be a stout woman with a North-country accent. The astonished Celt instinctively saluted Miss Crusoe as "Missus." This settled the matter. Miss Crusoe engaged her on board-wages, and called her Biddy, which is the feminine for "Man Friday."

The history of Miss Mary Crusoe from this point to her final deliverance from the island, becomes somewhat uninteresting. As she married the young sailor who rescued her, the merit of the story as a narrative of purely feminine adventure of course is lost. She brought her pets with her to New York, and, as her female acquaintances declare, a good many foreign airs also. She stuck up her nose at the best hotels of that city, and talked somewhat ostentatiously about "her island." For this reason I deem it prudent to end her history here.

The above is merely a specimen of what I expect to do in the way of filling the void I have spoken of. I propose hereafter to give a short sketch of "Susan the Giant Killer," and "Jane and her Rose Tree." Until then, I wait the recognition of a grateful juvenile public.

BRET.

JAMES B. JONES was killed at Grass Valley by Haskins Walker, a negro, recently, under the following circumstances: Jones went to the house of a courtesan in search of a man named Chase. Not finding him, he made an assault upon the woman, who fled to Walker's house for protection. Jones pursued her, threatening to kill Walker if he interfere. Walker did interfere, however, manfully, and received several severe wounds from a drawing-knife in the hands of the woman-whipper. Finally, Walker took down a gun which hung over the door, and fired at Jones, killing him instantly. Walker was arrested, but upon examination in a Justice's Court, was discharged from custody.

THE AGED STRANGER.

AN INCIDENT OF THE WAR.

"I WAS with Grant"—the stranger said;
Said the farmer: "Say no more,
But rest thee here at my cottage porch,
For thy feet are weary and sore."

"I was with Grant"—the stranger said;
Said the farmer: "Nay, no more—
I prithee sit at my frugal board,
And eat of my humble store."

"How fares my boy—my soldier boy,
Of the old Ninth Army Corps?—
I warrant he bore him gallantly
In the smoke and the battle's roar!"

"I know him not," said the aged man,
"And, as I remarked before,
I was with Grant"—"Nay, nay, I know,
Said the farmer, "Say no more;"

"He fell in battle—I see, alas!
Thou'ldst smooth these tidings o'er—
Nay: speak the truth, whatever it be Though it rend my bosom's core."

"How fell he—with his face to the foe,
Upholding the flag he bore?
O! say not that my boy disgraced
The uniform that he wore!"

"I can not tell," said the aged man,
"And should have remarked, before,
That I was with Grant—in Illinois,
Some three years before the war."

Then the farmer spake him never a word,
But beat with his fist full sore
That aged man who had worked for Grant
Some three years before the war!

THEATRICALS AT THE EAST.

THE theatres in New York were all closed on the 15th of April, and were to remain so for a period of time to be fixed by the Managers' Association. The act was voluntary on the part of all the theaters except Mrs. John Wood's Olympic. The reason given by her business manager was that it was a benefit night. It was not until the artists refused to act, that the theatre was closed. Mrs. John Wood was in no way connected with the affair.

Billy Birch, Dave Wambold, Charley Backus and W. Bernard, are still on their travels. They were to appear at Heller's Salle Diabolique on Broadway, May 8th. May they meet with as good success there as they did in our "land of gold."

Ben Cotton, Little Benny and Joe Murphy, performed in New London, Conn., on the 14th of April, to a crowded house. From there they would go to Norwich, Middletown, New Britain, and Waterbury. They are very popular with the theatre-goers of the East.

Heller's season at the Salle Diabolique, would close on the 6th of May, when he starts on a tour through the principal cities of the East.

Lucille Western, accompanied by her husband and James W. Collier, sails for Europe on the 14th of June.

Forrest has thrown King Lear and Othello aside, and was at last accounts playing Jack Cade, assisted by Manager Wheatley, at Niblo's Garden.

Miss Emily Thorne closed an engagement on the 15th of April, at Indianapolis. On the 10th, she appeared in the Hidden Hand.

At Wood's Theatre, Chicago, a new version of the Ticket-of-Leave-Man is now running a successful season. The characters are the same, but the plot is changed.

At McVicker's Theatre, Chicago, Mrs. Lander, nee Davenport, commenced a short but most successful engagement on the 10th of April, in Adrienne the Actress, before large and fashionable audiences.

Mlle Marietta Ravel has been very successful at Griswold's Opera House, Troy. She will appear soon in the military drama of the French Spy.

Mr. Ford intends producing Enoch Arden with great splendor at his Washington Theatre, with Edwin Adams as "Enoch Arden," and Mme. Scheller as "Annie Lee."

Christy's Minstrels and the George Moore troupe were at North Briton, Scotland, March 25th.

Miss Avonia Jones remains at the St. Charles Theatre, New Orleans, to fulfil another engagement.

Professor Anderson, the wizard, commenced a five nights' engagement at Merrill Hall, Detroit, May 4th.

Leslie, styled the "American Blondin," has been walking across the streets of Buffalo, on a tight-rope, with an old woman in his arms. (Why not carry a young woman?)

Jeems Pipes, (Stephen Massett,) gave "Drifting About," at Masonic Hall, New Orleans, March 31st. The house was densely crowded with a delighted audience.

John Owens ended his first series of performances on the 14th of April, at the Broadway, his wind-up being attended by a large audience. He gives up a couple of weeks to the Keans, and then returns again.

Orrin & Sebastian's Circus was doing well at last accounts, at Falmouth, Jamaica.

THE HAUNTED CASTLE.

BARON DE BRETIOLLE, a colonel in the Danish service, was ordered by the king to proceed with all possible despatch on a secret mission to the fortress of Rendsborg. He set off without delay to execute the commands of his Majesty, attended by one of his most trusty servants. Unaccustomed in such cases to heed any inconvenience, he disregarded fogs and darkness, tempests and rain. On this occasion, however, he was obliged to yield to circumstances. A tremendous storm, profound darkness, and the badness of the road, compelled him reluctantly to stop at a small village. At this place there was no inn, but only a pot-house, where nothing either to eat or drink was to be had, and where the very sight of the bed was sufficient to take away drowsiness. Bretiole, as a soldier, had long since learned, in case of emergency, to make shift with a bundle of straw for his couch; but fasting was a thing to which he could not so easily reconcile himself.

"Is there no gentleman's house in this village?" asked he.—"No," was the reply.—"No parsonage either?"—"Oh, yes.—"Are you on good terms with the parson?"—"Yes: he is a very worthy, excellent man."—"John, go to the parsonage, and inquire if we can have a lodging there to-night." The clergyman, a man of hospitable disposition, and not without breeding, cheerfully promised to accommodate him, and the colonel would have been equally welcome, even though he had not been a favorite of the king's, and travelling on a special commission. His host seasoned the simple repast prepared in haste with agreeable conversation, and the colonel ordered one bottle after the other of the wine that he had brought with him to be fetched out.

The conversation turned, among other things, on the ancient castle situated in the village. Throughout the whole country, far and wide, it had the character of being haunted by blood-thirsty spirits. Not a creature passed it without feeling a secret horror, and ejaculating a prayer. Bretiole, who never believed in real ghosts, but had long wished for a rencounter with reputed spectres, resolved to avail himself of this first opportunity that occurred for gratifying his curiosity, and therefore requested the ecclesiastic to permit him to sleep in the castle.

His host entreated him, for Heaven's sake, to relinquish his design. "I have no doubt," said he, "that you are superior to the popular notions concerning apparitions; but consider, colonel, that your temerity will infallibly cost you your life. You are not the first man of courage whose melancholy fate we have had occasion to deplore. Of all those who have hitherto ventured to pass the night in this fatal castle, there is no one but has been carried away by the evil spirits, either natural or supernatural. Why will you wantonly expose yourself to dangers which even the bravest and stoutest heart, owing to the inequality of the contest, cannot hope to surmount?"

The colonel, nevertheless, adhered to his resolution, trusting to the approved excellence of his pistols. "As I am travelling on his Majesty's business," thought he, "I may certainly venture to show any spirit that approaches too near me how well I can hit my mark."

The worthy divine, whose eloquence was incapable of shaking his determination, parted from him with evident emotion, persuaded that he should never more behold him alive. "God be with you!" emphatically cried he, more than once. Bretiole, on the other hand, hastened with youthful impatience to the castle: he carried the lantern himself, while his servant and the parson's man followed with bed and bedding.

Close to the entrance into the deserted castle, of which owls and mice seemed to be the only tenants, there was on the right a staircase which conducted into the great hall on the first floor. This hall had two doors leading into two contiguous rooms, one of which, being that nearest to the staircase, the colonel selected for his bed-chamber. He ordered two candles to be lighted, and, by way of precaution, had the lantern also placed near his bed. The parson's man was overwhelmed with fright; cold perspiration covered his brow, and he trembled in every joint. He earnestly entreated that the colonel's servant might accompany him with the lantern to the outer door of the castle, or he should certainly die. The colonel himself went with him, and then, having carefully charged his pistols, and laying his drawn sword by his side, he retired to bed without undressing.

About eleven o'clock he was roused by a tremendous noise. It was as though a regiment of hussars was entering the castle on horseback and marching up-stairs, trailing their clattering sabres after them. None but the most determined slanderer could have charged the colonel with cowardice; but he acknowledged, himself, that at this moment he felt a sensation more unpleasant than he had ever before experienced. It seemed as if some one was pouring a bucket of cold water over him; his hair began to stand on end, and he trembled all over. The appalling din lasted for some time, and gradually approached his chamber.

Seizing his sword with his right hand, and a pistol with his left, the colonel boldly awaited the assault. All at once, the door flew open as if by enchantment. At the terrific appearance of the spectre which entered, Bretiole's nerveless hands dropped the sword and pistol; for, to his inexpressible horror and astonishment, the moment the hideous apparition met his sight both candles were extinguished, but by what means he was utterly at a loss to conceive. The figure had fiery eyes, roared like an enraged lion, and rattled glowing chains. An infernal uproar now commenced over head: it seemed as if a hundred cannon-balls were rolling to and fro. Presently was heard a dismal howling and mewing, as though from a thousand dogs and cats; and the neighing of horses swelled the hellish concert. All at once there was a stunning report resembling that of a twenty-four pounder. This was succeeded by the harmonious chime of bells, and, last of all, was heard a piercing shout of Victory! A death-like silence ensued.

The colonel lay like one inanimate. The spectre thumped him and his servant unmercifully, and beat them both with chains. It retired, and descended the stairs with a prodigious clatter. The colonel, who had been only taken by surprise, and who was not deficient either in presence of mind or firmness, soon recovered himself. "If this spectre be a man," thought he to himself, "he must certainly have protected his body against steel and bullets; but if it be a spirit, neither sword nor pistol will be able to make any impression upon it. Should the ghastly figure return, I will muster courage and softly follow it as it retires." In this design he so confirmed himself, that he was resolutely bent on executing it, let the consequences be what they might.

In about an hour the goblin again came up stairs with as frightful a noise as before. Bretiole, whose heart was in the right place, was not to be driven from his purpose. He patiently submitted to the discipline which the hideous being again bestowed on him and his servant. At length it rushed out at the door with the same clattering and clanking noise which accompanied its entrance.

The colonel, true to his purpose, involuntarily grasped a pistol and cautiously pursued the spectre. Seemingly aware of his intention, it retired with its face towards him, so that its fiery eyes served him instead of a lantern. The flaming spectre suddenly disappeared: all around was now dark as pitch, and Bretiole was obliged to pause. He had previously imagined that he could hear that the spectre was preceded by several persons, the sounds of whom suddenly ceased before he lost sight of the figure. At the same time he heard his servant above, shrieking and howling in the most lamentable manner.

Hundreds, had they been in the place of our hero, would long ere this have been heartily sick of the nocturnal adventure, and after the first departure of the spectre would have quitted the haunted castle forever. Bretiole, however, was not yet daunted. Without further consideration he formed the desperate resolution of pursuing his way along the dark passage till he should reach the end of it. Scarcely had he proceeded a few paces, when down he sunk into an abyss. At the bottom of it he fortunately found himself on a heap of hay and straw. In the fall he had involuntarily pulled the trigger of his pistol, which was cocked, and fired. At the report, four sturdy fellows approached him with lights. "Audacious dog!" cried one of them, "how darest thou to presume to come hither?" They seized him by the arms, and dragged him like a criminal into a room where upwards of twenty persons, some of whom seemed to be of the higher class, were seated round a table. The apartment was elegantly furnished, and adorned with costly tapestry. The eyes of all were instantly fixed upon him; and they seemed to be not less astonished at his appearance than he was at theirs.

"Rash mau!" at length said one of them, "what hath induced thee to come to this castle? Has no one warned thee, no one told thee that thy temerity would infallibly cost thee thy life? Prepare to die—for die thou must."

"Die!" replied Bretiole; "I swear by the king that ye will pay dearly for my death!"

"Away with the impudent dog!" cried another: "we will show him that we heed not his threats."

At these words, the four fellows again seized him, and shut him up in a dark, narrow dungeon. The colonel was by this time thoroughly convinced that he was not among spectres, but among men who were here assembled on some important but mysterious business. He perceived a ray of light which penetrated his prison by a knot-hole in the door. He clapped his ear to this aperture, and could hear his judges debating how the danger which menaced them from his intrusion could best be averted. Some voted, without hesitation, for the death of the adventurer; but others were of a different opinion. At length it was agreed that he should be again brought before them and examined, and then they would consider of his sentence.

The colonel acquainted them with his rank, the object of his journey, and his motive for passing the night in the castle: he acknowledged, unasked, that the parson had urgently dissuaded him from an encounter with the spirits which haunted this place, and stated the motives for his advice. "For the rest," he continued, "I leave it for your consideration, gentlemen, whether my death or my life is likely to be more dangerous to you. For my part, I am of opinion that the first would, and for these reasons: I am the bearer of despatches from the king, the forwarding of which to their destination is of far greater importance than my life. Here are those despatches, sealed, as you see, with the royal seal. The clergyman of this place and his family know that I have taken up my lodging in this castle. If you deprive me of life, or merely of liberty, I shall instantly be missed, and the king, whose especial favor I am happy enough to possess, will not fail to command the utmost recesses of this castle to be ransacked, and the motives of your presence here, be they what they may, will inevitably be brought to light. I am a gentleman, and if I am not mistaken, there are among you persons who are my equals in that respect. These must know that I may be relied on when I pledge my word of honor never to betray the secret of this castle. Should you, however, deem an oath more binding than my word of honor, I am ready to swear."

The judges looked at one another, seemingly not a loss what to reply, till at length a blood-thirsty wretch broke silence and said, in a firm tone, "For my part, I think this fellow only wishes to lull us to sleep with his smooth tongue. My advice is, that he be put to death without farther delay." "I am of the same opinion," cried a second. "And so am I," said a third.

"Take him away," said the president of this infernal tribunal. The judges were for some time engaged in vehement discussion, but the majority were not only for sparing the colonel's life, but also for setting him at liberty, on his giving his word of honor: and their opinion ultimately prevailed. Bretiole awaited the final result of this long consultation in his prison. As a man, he could not hear this decision of his fate from the lips of the subterranean president without evident demonstrations of joy.

He was now dismissed in the politest manner. Two of the attendants accompanied him to the passage through which he had come in the dark, and conducted him by a secret door to the staircase where he had commenced his pursuit of the spectre. The colonel thanked Heaven that he had got off with a whole skin, and hastened to his servant, whom he found half dead with fright on his bed. The sight of his master revived the faithful fellow like a cordial; and both hastened from the den of murderers to the parsonage. The clergyman had been unable to sleep a wink for anxiety, and he was transported with delight, when, contrary to his expectations, he beheld the colonel in his house again alive.

Some years after this event, Bretiole, who had meanwhile been appointed privy-councillor, was residing on his estate in Jutland. He was just entertaining a party of the neighboring gentry, when a servant entered and informed him that a groom, with three led horses, desired particularly to speak to him. Bretiole went out, and the groom delivered to him a letter, saying, that it was a present from some gentleman of his acquaintance. Putting the bridles of two exquisitely beautiful chestnut horses into the hand of his attendant, the groom darted away with the other like a bird. The letter, which enclosed a finely executed gold medal of the value of twenty ducats, contained the following passage:

"The subterranean society which you once fell in with is dissolved, and therefore releases you from your promise and oath. It admires your silence, for which it is desirous of expressing to you its acknowledgments. The enclosed medal will enable you to guess its object, and though you know none of its members, either by name or rank, still they cannot deny themselves the pleasure of presenting to you the two horses sent herewith as a token of their esteem."

With a lightened heart Bretiole related to his guests the whole adventure, and all did him the justice to declare that the pranks of these coiners were so artfully devised, and so cleverly executed, that every one of them in his place would, in his first fright, have been convinced that he had seen a real spectre.

EVERYBODY has heard of the tunnel under Mont Cenis, which is to connect the railroad systems of Italy and France, and shorten the overland route to India four hundred miles. But it is going to take twelve years at least to construct this tunnel, and it is desirable to have the advantage of such a connection at once; it is therefore now proposed to build a railroad across the south face of the Alps, using as the basis the great military road of Napoleon. The road will be forty-eight miles long, and it is believed can be constructed in two years, while a locomotive has been invented which, it is thought, can successfully surmount the steep acclivities, turn the sharp curves, and descend the steep grades. This locomotive has recently been tried and found to accomplish the service perfectly. It is, in fact, a double engine, a horizontal and vertical engine combined, and so arranged that it may be worked either together, or separate, according to the steepness of the incline, and always with perfect safety. The line will be worked at an average speed of twelve miles an hour, and as many as one hundred and ninety passengers can be carried on each trip.

FARRAND'S OSCILLATINGAmalgamator.

THIS UNRIVALLED IMPROVEMENT FOR THE REDUCTION AND AMALGAMATION OF Gold and Silver Ores, is now running daily at No. 206 Commercial street, between Front and Davis.

THIS AMALGAMATOR INVOLVESNO COMPLICATED MACHINERY

And possesses the following advantages over all others now in use:

1st. It is capable of doing double the amount of work of the ordinary Pans, at a saving of more than one-half the power.

2d. It reduces the pulp finer, thereby producing a better result.

3d. It requires less quicksilver by one-half at a charge, whilst the loss by trituration is comparatively nothing.

4th. As an Amalgamator for gold contained in sulphurets, as also for very fine or flour gold, it has no equal.

5th. This Amalgamator involves no complicated machinery, and is less liable to get out of order than any of the pans.

DESCRIPTION OF FARRAND'S AMALGAMATOR.

In offering this Amalgamator to the public the inventor does not claim any new or scientific method of extracting the precious metals from the ores; he merely claims a new and simple combination of mechanical principles, whereby a great saving of power (full one-half in amount) is effected. The capacity of the machine varies with its size. The smallest, or prospecting size, will reduce 400 lbs. in three hours, and can be easily worked by the power of one man. The largest size will work 1,500 lbs. in three hours, or six tons in 24 hours, with an application of a trifle more than one-horse power. This saving of power, as all mill-men are aware, is an important consideration particularly where fuel is scarce. The power so saved in running the Amalgamators may be advantageously employed to an increase of stamps, and thus proportionally increasing the work of the mill. This machine consists of a semi-cylindrical, trough-shaped vessel, in the interior of which is furnished with moveable concave dies, to be replaced when worn out, as in ordinary pans. The millers are convex, and attached to a substantial rock shaft, by which they are moved back and forward by crank or eccentric motion. The millers are held to their places by springs of moderate strength, the pressure of which may be easily regulated. The oscillating motion of the millers serves to keep the pulp in a constant state of agitation, thoroughly mixing it, and passing it under the millers without resort to any of the various expedients employed in Pans where a circular motion is maintained. The peculiar construction of this machine admits of its being worked with a much smaller charge of quicksilver, to any given amount of pulp than the flat-bottomed Pans. The spiral springs greatly assist in the work of reduction, by allowing the free admission of the pulp between the millers and dies, so that the pulp is made to actually work upon itself—as the dust of the diamond is made to reduce the gem itself. The advantage derived of thus avoiding all trituration in the presence of quicksilver, must be apparent to any one at all acquainted with gold or silver amalgamating.

Trials made with this machine in the presence of experts, during the last six months, have been pronounced highly satisfactory. It is peculiarly well adapted to employment by small mining operators in distant localities, as it can readily be taken to pieces and packed upon mules.

A large size machine is constructed without dies or millers, but simply with arms to act as stirrers, to be used in connection with several of the Amalgamators as a "Separator," as it is found that the peculiar motion given to these arms, in connection with the concave shape of the body of the machine, renders it most effectual for such a purpose.

HOSTETTER'S CELEBRATED STOMACH BITTERS.

A TIMELY WARNING TO THE SICK.—It is especially important at this time, when the markets of the United States are flooded with the direst poisons, under the name of imported liquors, and when domestic compounds, purporting to be medicinal, but not a whit less pernicious, are heralded to the world as "sovereign remedies," that the public should fully understand the facts. Be it known, then, that while all the diffusive stimulants called liquors are impure, and all the Tonics containing alcohol are manufactured with a fiery article containing amyl or fusel oil, a mortal poison; HOSTETTER'S CELEBRATED STOMACH BITTERS contain none of these things, but are a combination of pure Essence of Rye with the pure juices of the most valuable stomachic, antibilious and aperient herbs and plants, and that as a safe and rapid remedy for Dyspepsia and all its kindred complaints, this preparation stands before the world without a rival or competitor. Its sales to-day are equal to the combined sales of all the other Tonics advertised in the United States, and the certificates which authenticate its usefulness are signed by individuals of the highest standing in every professional calling and walk of life. THEATRICAL TALK.

WHO dare say that the public of San Francisco are fickle, when every night for two weeks they have crowded Maguire's Opera House, and sat and laughed at Mr. Dan Setchell's impersonations from the rise of the curtain until its fall. Mr. Dan Setchell is a very amusing low comedian—almost the best we have ever had here—and has the faculty of making people laugh; but then, how ready they are to laugh, and how fearful of omitting the laugh when they are expected to! Mr. Setchell has shown considerable versatility, playing low comedy, high comedy, and eccentric comedy parts to the perfect satisfaction of the audience. His "Captain Cuttle" is an immense favorite with the public and to gratify the popular demand for it, the drama of Dombey and Son has been played, night after night. Last night, Mr. Setchell appeared in five different characters with immense success. I prefer Mr. Wheatleigh's "Hugh de Brass," to Mr. Setchell's, the latter being too heavy, physically, for light comedy. The period at which the public will weary of their present favorite is yet far distant. No man can do more to deserve public patronage than does Mr. Setchell. When called before the curtain, which happens every night, he is always ready with a neat and often very witty little speech, at which shouts of merriment break forth. Every night

"The whole quire hold their hips and loffe;
And yexen in their mirth, and weeze and swear.
A merrier hour was never wasted there."

This afternoon Mr. Setchell will appear in his immense character of "Captain Cuttle."

THE WEEK'S DESPATCHES.

COL. PRITCHARD, with 150 picked men, came up with Davis near Irwinsville, Ga., on the 9th inst., at 3 A. M. Davis put on his wife's dress, and endeavored to escape to the woods, but his boots betrayed his sex, and the soldiers commanded him to halt and surrender. Jeff, then brandished a howie knife and threatened mischief, but yielded to the persuasion of revolvers. Mrs. Davis remarked to one of the officers, after the capture was effected, that the soldiers had better not provoke "the President," or he might hurt some of them!

After the fall of Mobile, General Steele, with a body of troops, ascended the Alabama, on transports, as far as Selma, where he heard of the surrender of Johnston and the suspension of hostilities. He found that immense quantities of cotton had been concealed in that section of Alabama. The transports carried down to Mobile twenty-five hundred bales.

Loyal Mississippians are preparing to restore civil government in their State. Their convention will meet at Vicksburg on the 1st of June.

Chief Justice Chase is making a tour along the coast of the rebel States. At Wilmington he informed the North Carolinians that a military force would be retained in the rebel States until the people accepted the policy of immediate emancipation. Vance, having failed to get permission to return, as Governor, to Raleigh, has retired to his home in Buconombe county. Leading slaveholders have been trying to postpone emancipation, but have learned that the policy of the Government is fixed.

Wm. Holden, a strenuous opponent of secession for the past three years, is the Union emancipation candidate for Governor. The State Convention of North Carolina will meet on the 24th of May.

Bishop Johns of Virginia has issued a letter directing the restoration of the form of service used before the rebellion, and expressing the hope that the new order of things will prosper in his diocese. The Pierrepont State Government commences its labors in Richmond this week.

The trial of persons implicated in the assassination plot is proceeding in open court. The evidence of guilt is said to be conclusive. The conspiracy dates back to the summer of 1863. Booth was furnished with money from Richmond, and visited various parts of the country to consult with Saunders, Clay, Huleomb, Thompson and others. It is now stated that a letter from Jeff. Davis was found on Booth's body—a letter which amply justifies the charge that Davis was accessory to the murder of President Lincoln.

Late advices from England exhibit a friendly feeling on the part of the Queen, Parliament, Times and everybody else toward our country, and the warmest sympathy in our great bereavement.

Recruiting for the Republican army of Mexico is represented as being very brisk in the East. The news of the fall of Richmond created a great sensation in Mexico, giving fresh spirit to the Liberals and alarming the Imperialists. Maximilian was looking after his communications with Vera Cruz.

The rebels west of the Mississippi still talk fight. At a meeting at Shreveport, La., Col. Flournoy of Texas eulogized Booth, the assassin, comparing him to Brutus.

Dick Taylor surrendered with his command at Citronville, Ala., May 4th, on the same terms granted Lee.

The New York Herald's Washington despatch says it has been ascertained that nearly all the emigration schemes now creating so much excitement are totally unauthorized, and it is intimated that some of them have been instigated and managed by French emissaries, with the view to induce the Government to prohibit emigration.

Panama dates to the 5th state that the news of the assassination of President Lincoln cast a gloom over the entire community. A large meeting was held at the American Consulate, at which appropriate resolutions were adopted; half-hour guns were ordered to be fired, and a monument subscription of one dollar each was also started.

President Murillo has consented to act as mediator between Costa Rica and other Central American States.

A disturbance occurred at Bogota, owing to the refusal of some of the members of Congress to uncover their heads while a religious procession was passing. Several persons were shot. General Barrios has left Costa Rica, en route to San Salvador, with the object of heading the Liberal Party of that Republic in a revolution.

The Peruvian brig Admiral Guisse, with General Castella aboard a prisoner, had arrived at Acapulco, Mexico.

Spain had made claims against Chili, and munitions of war have been sent south by Chili to protect the places likely to be attacked.

The trouble between Uruguay and Paraguay is not yet settled.

The revolution in Peru progressed but little, and it is thought it will be put down.

THE INVENTION OF PRINTING.

[TRANSLATED FOR THE CALIFORNIAN.]

IN a beautiful manuscript copy of the collection of Gratian's Canons, preserved with much care in the library of the Celestins in Paris, the copyist, who tells us his name and his country, adds that he devoted twenty-one months to the completion of this copy.

At this rate, it would be necessary either to employ four thousand copyists for nearly two years, or one copyist for about eight thousand years, to produce four thousand copies of this collection, which to-day may be printed in three months and distributed in the same time, among four thousand readers.

No one better understood, and no one has so clearly traced the history of this happy discovery, as the celebrated Trithemius, who often conversed upon the subject with Peter Schaeffer of Gernsheim, partner of the two first inventors, and the one without whose industry the new project would perhaps have amounted to nothing. Relying chiefly upon his testimony and upon the account of the origin of printing contained in the second volume of the annals of the Abbey of Hirsauge, we cannot doubt for a moment that John Gutenberg of Mentz, in Germany, about the year 1440, had the first idea of this new art. He exhausted all his resources in unsuccessful attempts at realizing his conception, and finally formed a partnership with John Faust, a rich citizen of the same city, and Peter Schaiffer of Gernsheim, clerk of the Diocese of Mentz.

The purse of Faust and the industry of the young Schaiffer, who attached himself to his service, produced several very fair initial works, of which the most famous are the Compilation of Grammar, Rhetoric, Poetry, etc., by Jean de Genes, and the Mirror of Man's Salvation, (Speculum Humane Salvationis), which is a rhymed prose of very inferior latinity, with linear and unshaded figures at the top of the pages.

These first impressions were made upon tablets of wood in the same manner as practiced before in China and in Japan. They first wrote and sketched upon a transparent sheet the subject matter; then covering the written side with a thin glue or paste, they reversed the sheet and applied it to a tablet of suitable size. In this manner the figures and characters remained visible, but reversed and running from right to left. When the paper was quite dry they cut away, with sharp tools, all the wood which surrounded the letters and the margins of the figures, so as to give sufficient relief to the traced lines. They then covered the salient parts with an ink of suitable thickness of which they had considerable difficulty in forming the proper consistence. A sheet of paper extended over the whole and properly pressed, took the imprint of the figures and letters, all the rest remaining white.

It was not easy to make an impression on the back of the leaf without blotting it, and the better to sell these impressions, while giving them the appearance of manuscripts, they printed upon the obverse of one leaf and upon the reverse of the next. The two white sides thus faced each other, and pasting them together they had a leaf written as usual upon both sides. The copy of the Mirror of Salvation, in the library of the Celestins in Paris, has this peculiarity, that the leaves are not pasted, but have throughout two printed sides adossed by two white, with the evident design of having them pasted together, which plainly reveals the artifice of these first productions.

Our inventors soon tired of this process. A leaf badly pasted caused the loss of a copy where the tablet was worn out. Besides, these engraved tablets could only serve for a single work.

These inconveniences and the paucity of their profits, inspired one of them—perhaps John Faust—with the idea of working with separate characters, which could be conjoined and disjoined and employed on different pages of the same work and then upon other works. But wooden blocks or pegs, terminated by a character in relief, being alternately blackened, washed, dried, remoistened, swelling and shrinking, speedily became warped and worthless. Difficulties multiplied under their feet. They had recourse to the metals. They tried to cast, in molds, little columns of lead or of copper, each terminated by a letter. But lead and brass were too soft. Iron and copper were too brittle. Everything continued clumsy, shapeless and unserviceable.

At last, after repeated trials and many failures, the industrious Schaiffer crowned the joy of his partners by showing them punches which he had devised to form the hollow molds and an alloy suitable for the castings, which he had discovered, after trying various combinations of the metals, with a view of correcting the brittleness of one by the softness of another without prejudice to the hardness of the compound. Thus was attained a degree of perfection in the art. Faust so appreciated the skill and perseverance of Schaiffer that he gave him his daughter in marriage, and bequeathed him his property; and Schaiffer, after the death of Gutenberg and of Faust, continued to carry on the printing establishment at Mentz. The first valuable print of this last discovery is the beautiful Bible finished in 1462, of which Faust carried copies to Paris, which are still preserved there.

It has been a matter of surprise that the names of the printers are not found in the impressions from wood of the Speculum Salvationis, and that the name of Gutenberg is not found at the end of the beautiful Bible printed with the first metallic characters. The reason of the first omission proceeds from the fact that they wished to give to these works the air of manuscripts, and concealed their art as their names, wishing to derive a profit by selling copies at the same rate as those made with the pen.

The reason of the other omission is that Gutenberg, having been required to make, to the firm, certain advances that he thought were not due from him, became disgusted, and withdrew before 1455.

He went to reside successively in Strasburg and in Harlem, then returned to Mentz, where he died about 1468.

The establishment of his printing house at Strasburg, where he worked with John Mentel, and at Harlem where he worked apparently with Lawrence Coster afterwards, gave currency to the opinion that in one or the other of these two cities it was necessary to look for the cradle of the art of printing, and gave rise to fine stories; as well of Coster—from whom it has been said Faust stole the molds of his letters and the honor of the invention—as of Mentel from whom it has been said Gensfleisch made a similar theft to impart the whole to Gutenberg, although Gensfleisch and Gutenberg are the same man.

In the beautiful Bible of 1462, in the Psalter of 1457, in Cicero's De Officiis of 1465, and in many other works, we always find Faust and Schaiffer in company until 1466, when Schaiffer appears alone after the death of his father-in-law. Not only did they affix their names to these works but they took pride in the new invention. The matter could not, in fact, be kept secret after the withdrawal of Gutenberg, but as it was not yet known in Paris in 1462, Faust bethought himself to detach the last leaf from his Bible, and in its place to insert another in which he abstained from speaking of the method of multiplying books. The beauty of these pretended manuscripts enabled him to get for them in Paris all he chose to ask. But when he perceived that they began to reason much upon the astonishing resemblance of all his copies, and began to get wind of the new invention, he promptly lowered the price and regained Mainz, to avoid prosecution on the charge of extortion.

Two beautiful monuments in Germany, one erected in the public square in front of the Cathedral at Mentz, the other in the market place of Strasburg, commemorate the genius of Gutenberg. They are both in the form of statues, the former erect, the latter seated. The one at Strasburg excels as a work of art, and besides the noble face and form of Gutenberg, has an elaborate quadrangular base, on the four sides of which are represented in relief the triumphs of printing in the four quarters of the globe.

The side representing America, presents, as a prominent feature, Franklin with his printing press—a very good likeness of our patriot philosopher, surrounded by other worthies of our early history.

F.

THOS. I. JACKSON, treasurer of the Winter Garden Theatre, was arrested on the 16th of April, in New York, for using exceedingly traitorous language. He said he was glad that the President was assassinated; that he would have shot him himself, if Booth had not. He tried to deny the charge, but several witnesses appeared to testify to its truthfulness. He was taken to police headquarters and detained pending the decision of General Dix.

ACCORDING to the Russian custom, the wife of the late Duke de Morny cut off her hair and put it in his coffin, as a pledge not to marry again.

HOW PROFESSIONALS LIKE THE "BRADBURY."—Harry Sanderson, the celebrated pianist, writes:

After having tried and thoroughly tested the piano fortes of every first class maker in this city, I hesitate not to say that Bradbury's "Grand Scale Square" is by far the most powerful, brilliant, pure and even-toned of any square piano of any make whatever with which I am acquainted. It is truly a wonderful instrument, combining the power and singing qualities of the full-sized "Grand," with the beautiful, round, pure and delicate tones of the "Square." I most fully coincide with the other musical gentlemen recently assembled at Mr. Bradbury's warehouses, in pronouncing these instruments the best square pianoforte I have ever played upon.

Very truly yours,
HARRY SANDERSON.

U. S. 7-30 LOAN.

BY AUTHORITY OF THE SECRETARY OF the Treasury, the undersigned has assumed the General Subscription Agency for the sale of United States Treasury Notes, bearing seven and three-tenths per cent. interest, per annum, known as the

SEVEN-THIRTY LOAN.

These Notes are issued under date of June 15th, 1865, and are payable three years from that time, in currency or are convertible, at the option of the holder, into

U. S. 5-20 SIX PER CENT.

GOLD BEARING BONDS.

These bonds are new worth a premium of nine per cent. including gold interest from November, which makes the actual profit on the 7-30 loan at current rates, including interest, about ten per cent. per annum, besides its EXEMPTION FROM STATE AND MUNICIPAL TAXATION, WHICH ADDS FROM ONE TO THREE PER CENT. MORE, according to the rate levied on other property. The interest is payable in currency, semi-annually, by coupons attached to each note, which may be cut off and sold to any bank or banker. The interest amounts to

One cent. per day on a $50 note.
Two cents " " $100 "
Ten " " $500 "
20 " " $1,000 "
$1 " " $5,000 "

Notes of all denominations named will be promptly furnished upon receipt of subscriptions. This is now offered by the Government, and it is confidently expected that its superior advantages will make it the great

THE ONLY LOAN IN MARKET

Popular Loan of the People.

Less than $300,000,000 of the loan authorized by the last Congress, are now on the market.

This amount, at the rate of which it is being absorbed, will all be subscribed for within four months, when the notes will undoubtedly command a premium, as has uniformly been the case on closing the subscriptions to other Loans.

In order that citizens of every town and section of the country may be afforded facilities for taking the loan, the National Bank, State Banks, and Private Bankers throughout the country have generally agreed to receive subscriptions at par. Subscribers will select their own agents, in whom they have confidence, and who only are to be responsible for the delivery of the notes for which they receive orders.

A NEW INVENTION!

LEWIS'S

Self-Acting Wagon Brake!

By means of this invention, the wheels of a wagon are made to lock themselves when going down hill, certainly and effectively, and are released the moment there is any strain on the horses, without attention on the part of the driver.

It is already in use in many parts of the East, and has everywhere given satisfaction.

It will lock a wheel so that it CANNOT REVOLVE, the efforts of the wheel to turn making the lock tighter.

It operates in an instant, locking or unlocking as necessary.

It needs no care and requires no exertion,

It cannot fail to work, and is easier on the team than the common brake.

Simple in its construction, and costing no more than the common lock, it gives perfect security, and a child may drive the heaviest wagon over the steepest roads.

It can be used in the same way as the common hand or foot brake: A touch on the lever will effectually lock the wheels, and

UNA WAYS ARE IMPOSSIBLE.

ALAMEDA PARK HOTEL.

This new and elegant House will be opened for the reception of guests, on SATURDAY, the 18th instant. It is situated on the Alameda Encinal, within three minutes' walk of the San Leandro Railway, and three miles from the end of the wharf, between which and the foot of Broadway, steamers ply at frequent intervals during the day. The hotel can be reached by boat and rail, in forty minutes from Montgomery street. The location is in the midst of a dense grove, and, as a suburban resort, cannot be surpassed for beauty and healthfulness.

This hotel is splendidly fitted up with all the modern improvements, and in every respect will be conducted as a first class public house.

The proprietor would call especial attention of families to the attractiveness of this locality, so accessible, and yet retired, and free from the turmoil of the city.

Bowling Alleys, Billiard rooms, and all of the leading journals of the day will be at the disposal of visitors, while the sportsman can find an abundance of wild game in the vicinity of the hotel.

By a strict attention to business the proprietor hopes to merit the public patronage.

THE LAST ADDRESS OF THE PRESIDENT TO THE COUNTRY.

PROBABLY all men in all quarters of the world, who read President Lincoln's last Inaugural Address, were impressed by the evident tone of solemnity in it, and the want of any expression of personal exultation. There he stood, after four years of such trial, and exposed to such hate and obloquy as no other great leader in modern history has experienced, successful, re-elected, his policy approved by the people and by the greater test of events, the terrible rebellion evidently coming to its end, and he himself now certain of his grand position in the eyes of history—and yet not a word escaped him of triumph, or personal glory, or even of much hopefulness. We all expected more confidence—words promising the close of the war and speaking of the end of our difficulties. Many hoped for some definite line of policy to be laid out in this address. But instead, we heard a voice as if from some prophet, looking with solemn gaze down over the centuries, seeing that both sides in the great contest had their errors and sins, that no speedy victory could be looked for, and yet that the great Judge of the world would certainly give success to right and justice. The feeling for the bondmen and the sense of the great wrong done to them, with its inevitable punishment, seemed to rest with such solemn earnestness on his soul, that to the surprise of all and the derision of the flippant, an official speech became clothed in the language of the Bible. The English and French critics all observed this peculiar religious tone of the Inaugural, and nearly all sensible persons felt it not unsuited to the grandeur and momentous character of the events accompanying it. Many pronounced it a Cromwellian speech; but it had one peculiarity, which Cromwell's speeches never possessed—a tone of perfect kindness and good-will to all, whether enemies or political opponents.

"With charity to all and malice for none," President Lincoln made his last speech to the world. Men will reperuse that solemn address with ever-increasing interest and emotion, as if the shadow of his own tragic fate and the near and unseen dangers to the country, rested unconsciously on its words. It will seem natural that no expression of exultation or personal triumph escaped the great leader of this revolution, but that his mind was filled with the impressive religious lessons of the times. It will be thought characteristic of his sense of justice and his sincere humanity, that his last public address to the country was most of all occupied by the wrongs done to the helpless race, whose friend and liberator he had been. And it will seem but a part of this wonderful spirit of good-will to all, that not a syllable of bitterness toward the enemies of his country, to the traitors at home, or his personal revilers escaped his lips.

It is such a speech to the world as a Christian statesman would gladly have his last—earnest, humane, truly, but not technically, religious, filled with forgiveness and replete with good will.

When generations have passed away, and the unhappy wounds of this war are healed, and the whole nation is united on a basis of universal liberty, our posterity will read the dying words of the great Emancipator and leader of the people with new sympathy and reverence, thanking God that so honest and pure a man, so true a friend of the oppressed, and so genuine a patriot, guided the nation in the time of its trial, and prepared the final triumph which he was never allowed to see.—N. Y. Times.

"We stand in the presence of a mighty sorrow," was said on an occasion of melancholy import, but who can measure the sorrow that fills the public heart to-day in view of the dire calamity that has fallen upon it? The transition from joy to grief was like some retroaction of the seasons that returned the chills of winter to blight and destroy the flowers of spring. At the time of the most joyful anticipations, when hope of speedy peace was at its height, through the wisdom and ability of the great man whom Providence seemed to have raised up for the purpose of securing it, the telegraph brought us the intelligence of the assassin's work, and our eyes were shocked with the recital of the unparalleled horror. It is the culminating step in the suicidal policy of the South and its sympathizers—who have from the first struggled, as if with a design to bring woe upon their own heads, while threatening ours—for they have overthrown the power which meant them no evil—one who was striving to bring them again into the fold as a free people, with all his generous nature alive to their subsequent interest and good. Boston Evening Gazette, April 15th.

Every portion of our country must feel the calamity of this fiendish act—the assassination of President Lincoln—and none ought to be more startled by it than the insurgents of the South, for they have lost the man, of all others in the North, whose natural kindness and abounding humanity inclined him to the side of mercy in their case. But yesterday the face of the land was bright with the smile of hope. To-day it is covered with sadness and doubt. What further trial an inscrutable Providence may have in store for us none may know. In this awful moment of our bereavement we can only think of our loss, and pray that Almighty God will give us wisdom and strength to follow in the footsteps of his great example.—Home Journal.

THE MOURNING OF THE SLAVES.

ONE of the Commissioners for Emancipation was at Hill-tou Head in the earlier part of the war, and overheard a gang of negroes, working for the Government, talk about their final chances for liberty. The question was raised among them whether the President knew their condition and would liberate them. An aged slave among them, who seemed a "class-leader," stopped his work, and, in the most impressive manner, said to them, with a certain awe which they all evidently responded to: "De President! Why, ob course he knows! He is ebrywhere! He is like de bressed Lord; he walks de waters and de land!" This gentleman afterward related this incident to Mr. Lincoln, and the kind-hearted man had to turn away to the window to hide his tears at this instance of touching confidence and superstitious reverence in this simple-minded race toward himself.

In this time of national mourning, when the badges of sorrow cover the dwellings of the rich, when funeral drapery festoons the public halls and the churches, when organs peal the notes of grief to weeping audiences, when the voices of the clergy repeat in moving tones the virtues of the deceased, and call up again the nation's loss, and a whole people is bowed in affliction, there will be no deeper mourning for the beloved and honored head of the Republic than in the cabins of the slaves. In lonely huts, where the news of the great crime has penetrated, in the villages of the emancipated from Virginia and the Carolinas, in the crowded haunts of the poor negroes within the great cities, there will be grief to-day, such as needs no funeral orations, or badges of gloom and mourning. The tears of the forgotten and outcast and oppressed slave, now redeemed to his manhood, will be the sincerest tears that fall on the grave of the President. From the cottages of the poor and the down-trodden will come his truest requiem. And hundreds of thousands of honest hearts, whom the world knows not of, will mourn this day the loss of their best friend and their emancipator. It has long been known to those dealing with the freedmen of the South, that in the eyes of that simple people, Mr. Lincoln was a kind of a prophet and divine leader. His Proclamation of Emancipation has echoed in every slave settlement of the rebel States. He was known to be their great friend, and was looked forward to as their deliverer. All the armies and navies of the Union were supposed by many of them to be merely the instruments of this powerful and good redeemer. Whatever disasters occurred, these persons never doubted of final success to the arms of Master Lincoln.

There is a historical appropriateness in the fact that President Lincoln should be mourned most of all by the slaves. History judges men especially by their relation to great ideas and great movements. The removal of slavery from this continent will by and by be thought the grand act of this century; an era like the Reformation in Europe, or the establishment of a republic on this side of the Atlantic. Public men will be measured by their opposition to or approval of it. Mr. Lincoln will be especially remembered as the great emancipator, and the leader of the American Republic when she first shook off the fearful burden of slavery. The "Friend of the Slave" will be his lasting title with posterity. Men will not cease to remember and relate his gradual, reasonable, patient efforts to rid the nation of this curse: his sympathy with those in bonds, the tenacity with which he adhered to his policy of emancipation, his increasing sense of the guilt of slavery, and his final tragic death, suffered in part from his devotion to an oppressed race.

It is most fitting that for such a statesman the poor and the bondmen should most of all mourn, and that with the tears of the nation he led to a higher justice and unity, should fall also the tears of the subject race for whom he effected so much while living, and for whom, in part, he died.

The Washington Star of April 15th, speaking of the last moments of President Lincoln, says: "His countenance assumed an expression of perfect serenity. There were no indications of pain, and it was not known that he was dead until the gradually decreasing respiration ceased altogether. Mrs. Lincoln, with female friends, remained in an adjoining room, occasionally visiting the dying man, who loved her so devotedly. The last visit is described as having been affecting in the extreme. As she entered the room and saw her beloved husband's features were disturbed and discolored, she fell back on the floor. Restoratives were applied, and she was soon supported to the bedside, when she frantically addressed the dying man. 'Live!' she exclaimed; 'live if but for one moment, to speak to me once more!—to speak to our children!' But she was not again to hear the voice that had cheered her life, and no sign of recognition gladdened her grief-stricken heart."

* * * "Mr. Lincoln lived to witness the beginning of the end of his work in behalf of freedom, in the destruction of the foe of his country and in the restoration of our flag to every State in the great compact. He has gone down to the tomb full of honors, and his memory will be cherished by millions of freemen in every quarter of the globe."—New York Clipper.

JOHN WILKES BOOTH, THE ASSASSIN.

THIS base wretch, who has made his name infamous, was a native of Maryland. He was born in Baltimore, not thirty years ago. The precise date cannot be accurately ascertained, nor is it important. In appearance J. Wilkes Booth was singularly prepossessing. His bearing was so youthful, his eye so round and clear that he scarcely seemed—a month ago—to have passed his majority. The Booth family is well favored, not merely in the physical lines that indicate beauty, but in a settled thoughtfulness of expression which suggests earnest introspection. J. Wilkes Booth possessed less of this latter quality than his brother Edwin. His eye was black, piercing and rather hard; quick, excitable and at times fierce. His face was bloodless, but clear, healthy and fascinating in its pallor. Its usual expression indicated firmness, but not brutality. He was about five feet nine or ten inches in height; of slight but well-knit proportions; of active and energetic habits, and of no settled purpose. Inheriting the honored name which he has disgraced, he early became an actor. Any one called Booth could do well in that profession. He adopted it, therefore, as a ready means of subsistence, played with moderate success in the principal cities of the Union, and a few years since fulfilled a short engagement at Wallack's old Theatre, now known as the Broadway. He was spoken of as an impetuous, uneven, ill-balanced performer, who yet displayed moments of power. More than a year ago he temporarily abandoned the stage for a profession that required less study, and afforded a wider margin for his desultory habits. Bold, quick-sighted, unscrupulous, he became a speculator. He visited the oil regions of Pennsylvania and Western Virginia, and entered largely into the operations that the new mania gave birth to. So completely did he identify himself with this interest that he spoke freely of never acting again until he had made a fortune by it. Only on Tuesday of last week, he met a friend in Broadway who desired to sell him some oil lands. Booth thought favorably of the proposition, and said that he would select an acre here and there, as an investment, but that he could not do so until he returned from Washington. His friend expressed some surprise at the circumstance of his wanting to go to the Capital, but Booth said that it was imperative. We know now for what he went.

He was a bitter Secessionist, and sought no opportunity of disguising the fact; demonstrating it not with blatant tongue and fierce gesture, but with nerves trembling, lips twitching and a voice sibilant with intensity. In such moments the still, marble face was suffused with blood, and he became almost unconscious. Quite recently his brother Edwin ejected him from his house in New York simply because his expressions were unhearable to a man of loyalty and intelligence. And here it is only thoughtful and honest to say that the Union cause has had no stronger or more generous supporter than Mr. Edwin Booth. From the commencement he has been earnestly and actively solicitous for the triumph of our arms, and the welfare of our soldiers. An incident—a trifle in itself—may be recalled at this moment when the profound monotony of grief overwhelms us. Not a month since, Mr. Edwin Booth was proceeding to Washington. At Trenton there was a general scramble to reach the cars, which had started, leaving many behind in the refreshment saloon. Mr. Edwin Booth was preceded by a gentleman whose foot slipped as he was stepping upon the platform, and who would have fallen at once beneath the wheels had not Mr. Edwin Booth's arm sustained him. The gentleman remarked that he had a narrow escape of his life and was thankful to his preserver. It was Robert Lincoln, the son of that great, good man who now lies dead before our blistered eyes, and whose name we cannot mention without choking.

In some way the incident came to the knowledge of Lieut.-General Grant, who at once wrote a civil letter to Mr. Edwin Booth, and said that if he could serve him at any time he would be glad to do so. Mr. Booth replied, playfully, that when he (Grant) was in Richmond, he would like to play for him there. It is a trifle, but it is just to remember trifles when a man so stricken and overburdened with woe as is Mr. Edwin Booth is spoken of.

John Wilkes Booth was a person of not absolutely intemperate habits, but under the influence of stimulants he was uncontrollable, offensive and violent. His last appearance in public was at the Winter Garden, on the evening of Nov. 23, 1864, when a performance was given in aid of the Central Park Shaksperian statue fund. On that occasion the three male members of the family were present, namely, Junius Brutus Booth, Edwin Booth and John Wilkes Booth—the latter being the youngest. An aged mother, we grieve to say, survives the ignominy of her child.

A Boston paper refers to the last appearance of J. Wilkes Booth in that city, (about one year ago,) with the remark: "At that time he was so vehement and bitter in his denunciations of Mr. Lincoln and his Administration, and was so violent in his expressions of joy over every Union defeat, that he was frequently cautioned and finally avoided by his brother actors."

ASTHMA, CROUP,

DISEASES OF THE THROAT, BRONCHITIS,

Pains and Oppression of the Chest or Lungs,

DIFFICULT BREATHING,

AND ALL THE

DISEASES OF THE PULMONARY ORGANS.

ITS ACTION IS EXPECTORANT, ALTERATIVE, SUDORIFIC, SEDATIVE, DIAPHORETIC and DIURETIC, which renders it one of the most valuable remedies known for curing diseases of the lungs. It excites expectoration, and causes the lungs to throw off the phlegm or mucus, changes the secretions and PURIFIES THE BLOOD; heals the irritated parts; gives strength to the digestive system, brings the liver to its proper action, and imparts, beyond the possibility of doubt, strength to the whole system. Such is the immediate and satisfactory effect, that it is warranted to break up the most distressing cough in a few hours' time, if not of too long standing. It is warranted to give entire satisfaction even in the most confirmed cases of Consumption. It is warranted not to produce costiveness, which is the case with most remedies, or affect the head, as it contains no Opium in any form. It is warranted to be perfectly harmless to the most delicate child, although it is an active and powerful remedy for restoring the system. There is no real necessity for so many deaths by Consumption, when ALLEN'S LUNG BALSAM will prevent it, if only taken in time.

BRANDRETH'S PILLS!

THE SAFE PATH TO HEALTH!

PURIFY THE BLOOD!

The value of Brandreth's Pills, in a climate like ours is hardly to be estimated. Their prompt use every day saves valuable lives. Always keep them in the house.

In cholera and in sudden pains of all kinds they soon give relief, and the patient is restored with renewed health.

BRANDRETH'S PILLS!

For one hundred and thirteen years, have held their reputation for efficacy, mildness and absolute certainty of operation; in fact, they are admitted to be the BEST PURGATIVE by all who have used them.

THEY ARE UNRIVALLED AS A FAMILY

MEDICINE,

In Dyspepsia, Loss of Appetite, Habitual Costiveness, Rheumatic Pains in the Head, in Affections of the Kidneys, in the Diseases of Children, and for Worms, and as a General Purifier of the Blood. For Colds, Bilious Affections, Fevers and Disorders arising from Obstructed Perspiration, so common in this climate, they have not their equals among all the Medicines of the Day.

AS A PURGATIVE AND BILIOUS PILL,

They have not their equal in the world. Employed according to directions, accompanying every box of new style, they produce

Great Purity of the Blood and System Generally.

BRANDRETH'S PILLS are sold at 25 cents per box, enveloped in full directions. Purchase none unless in Private Government Stamp is on the box. See upon it "B. BRANDRETH," in white letters.

WONDERFUL TRIUMPH

IN AMERICAN DENTISTRY.

DR. BEERS & CO.,

Having removed from 617 Clay street
To 129 MONTGOMERY STREET, SAN FRANCISCO
ARE NOW MANUFACTURING THE NEW style of ARTIFICIAL TEETH so highly approved at the East, and which to be appreciated only requires to be seen. The Teeth, Gums and Plate are made of one entire piece of Porcelain without seam or joint, combining great strength and beauty with absolute purity and freedom from any metallic taste, while the coloring of the gums and the interior of the month are so perfect as to almost defy detection. All interested in the progress of the Arts are invited to examine samples of this work.

Superior Gold and Vulcanite Work also manufactured as usual, but at greatly reduced price. jul8

DR. LIBBEY,

WOULD RESPECTFULLY APPRISE the inhabitants of San Francisco and the community at large, that he has established himself in this city as a permanent resident, and has taken spacious rooms at No. 224 MONTGOMERY STREET, opposite the Russ House, where he will devote his particular attention to the practice of DENTISTRY.

He will not make elaborate pretensions to any mysterious claims made by many in the profession, but flatters himself that a constant and extensive practice of nineteen years, with due attention to all improvements extant, will capacitate him to compete with any in the profession. Teeth set in any style, or on any base desired—Gold, Platinum, Silver, or Vulcanite, now much in vogue. Teeth plugged substantially with all popular materials. Teeth extracted with or without anæsthetic agencies. All professional services—Medical, Surgical or Mechanical—insured to give satisfaction, or no charge.

Entrance to office, directly opposite the Russ House hall door.

DR. WISTAR'S BALSAM

—OF—

WILD CHERRY,

HAS BEEN USED FOR

NEARLY HALF A CENTURY,

With the most astonishing success in curing

Coughs, Colds, Hoarseness, Sore Throat, Influenza, Whooping Cough, Croup, Liver Complaint, Bronchitis, Difficulty of Breathing, Asthma, and every Affection of

The Throat, Lungs and Chest,

INCLUDING EVEN

CONSUMPTION.

There is scarcely one individual in the community who wholly escapes, during a season, from some one, however slightly developed, of the above symptoms—a neglect of which might lead to the last named and most to be dreaded disease in the whole catalogue. The power of the "medicinal gum" of the Wild Cherry Tree over this class of complaints is well known; so great is the good it has performed, and so great the popularity it has acquired.

In this preparation, besides the virtues of the Cherry, there are commingled with it other ingredients of like value, thus increasing its value tenfold, and forming a Remedy whose power to soothe, to heal, to relieve, and to cure disease, exists in no other medicine yet discovered.

The unequalled success that has attended the application of this medicine in all cases of

has induced many physicians of high standing to employ it in their practice, some of whom advise us of the fact under their own signatures. We have space only for the names of a few of these:

S. H. Finley, M. D., San Francisco, Cal.
 E. Boyden, M. D., Exeter, Me.
 Alexander Hatch, M. D., China, Me.
 R. Fellows, M. D., Hill, N. H.
 W. H. Webb, M. D., Cape Vincent, N. Y.
 W. B. Lynch, M. D., Auburn, N. Y.
 Abraham Skillman, M. D., Boundbrook, N. J.
 H. D. Martin, M. D., Mansfield, Pa.

The proprietors have letters from all classes of our fellow-citizens, from the Halls of Congress to the humblest cottage, and even from beyond the seas; for the fame and virtues of WISTAR'S BALSAM have extended to the "utmost bounds of the earth," without any attempt on our part to introduce it beyond the limits of our own country.

TO CALIFORNIANS AND OREGONIANS.

In future all genuine WISTAR'S BALSAM OF WILD CHERRY for the Pacific Coast will be enclosed in a new wrapper which will bear the printed names of both SETH W. FOWLE & CO., Boston, Mass., and JOHN D. PARK, Cincinnati, Ohio, as well as fac-simile of the signatures of "I. BUTTS," "SANFORD & PARK," and "H. WISTAR, M. D."
